JWI honours Ellie Tesher

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ellie Tesher, journalist, author and syndicated columnist of the advice column Ellie, was recently named Jewish Women International of Canada-Toronto's 48th annual woman of the year.

She was honoured at the organization's annual luncheon for her years of focusing on local and international social justice issues.

Tesher, who did freelance work for The Canadian Jewish News in the mid-1970s, began her career at the Toronto Star as a general reporter in 1977. She went on to become a features writer, an investigative reporter, lifestyles editor and Sunday Star editor.

In 1999, she wrote The Dionnes, a book about the Canadian quintuplets who were born during the Depression and brought millions of tourist dollars to Ontario. Since her book was published, the surviving quints who were living in poverty, successfully sued the Ontario government for more than one million dollars each.

When the Chicago Sun Times ran a contest to replace Ann Landers a number of years ago, Tesher was interested, she said, but did not feel the time was right. When Landers died in 2002, however, Tesher e-mailed her boss and said, "this job is for me.

"He knew I was right. Everyone has always come to me for advice. I'm a good listener, I'm intuitive, and I'm an intense observer of human behaviour," she said from her Star office.

"I've always been more interested in writing about people than about the dry matter of issues. I look at how issues impact people; I always study human reactions."

Several years ago, said Tesher, she wrote an article about an abused wife who later contacted her and said she had turned her life around and gone on to become a successful romance writer. "She said that after the story appeared she took a good look at herself."

With Tesher's column now running in 34 newspapers across Canada and at the Chicago Sun Times, she said her job is "everything I had hoped it would be. It is a dream."

With the help of full-time researcher Liz McDonell, Tesher says she has dealt with in excess of tens of thousands of letters, mostly by e-mail, since she took over. "I always think how I can address a person. How can I, in a single answer, offer some spark of encouragement and hope?"

On the occasion that she gets a disturbing letter from someone who sounds suicidal, she answers immediately, she said. "I don't wait for the answer to appear in the paper. I try to live with some compassion."

As well as her column, Tesher also does public speaking, appears on panels and co-hosts a weekly radio show on CFRB 1010 with her daughter Lisi.

"I'm a good fit for what I do because my life experiences have been contemporary. I've gone through a divorce, I've re-married, I've been a single working mother" – her son Stephen is a writer in New York – "I have stepchildren, and I've cared for my ailing mother."

Now, she said with a twinkle in her eye, she's become a grandmother to Charlie, son of Lisi. "I was not prepared for how drawn I would be to this little thing. The whole miracle of birth astonished me all over again. I was there for the birth, and it was fabulous."

Her husband, Vian Ewart, has retired from the Star where he was a senior editor, "and he is having a wonderful time, but I wouldn't change any of this to retire. I don't see it at all."

Agism can be so painful, she said. "I'm proud of my age, and I'm happy to show that energy, enthusiasm and curiosity keep you young in spirit."

She accepted JWI's honour, she said, because "I admire the organization. [It is made up of a group of] hardworking women who are devoted to the cause of social injustice.

"They sought out someone who exemplifies the work that they do, and being honoured is a huge professional and personal accolade. I am extremely flattered and delighted."

BRAIN SCIENCE: Forty-six Grade 12 biology students from William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute visited the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care last month to meet with leading neuroscientists and other researchers. The students learned about current research aimed at better understanding the aging brain and how to improve the care of the elderly. Here, Dr. Terry Picton, a senior scientist at Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute, talks with students Prital Patel, left, and Aditya Natarajan about electrical activity in the brain. The meetings are part of a new partnership between Baycrest and the school to integrate educational experiences and promote community spirit.

Jewish Life

The lonely and the ruthless

By RABBI YECHIEL GOLDREICH

Rabbinic Reflections

I heard of a young widow who was in a really bad situation.

She was new in the country, she didn't speak the language well and she had very few job skills. To make matters more difficult, she had to care for her elderly mother-in-law.

Her mother-in-law tried not to be a burden, but it wasn't easy. The old woman had been "a somebody" in her younger years and hadn't adjusted well to the changes in her life. I'm sorry to say the Jewish community wasn't very welcoming to this young widow. She received few invitations for Shabbat. Her quiet presence simply didn't register with most people. The Jewish community is built for families, not for singles, and especially not for poor singles who are new in town and dealing with a elderly person who needs care.

In shul, she would hear the yentas at work, whispering to each other too loudly, "Who's that? Is she related to so and so? Is she really Jewish? She doesn't look Jewish. Really! How does she make a living? Oh, that's too bad. Mother-in-law, eh! How does she stand it? I hate my mother in law." On and on they went. All she could do was daven and pretend not to hear them.

There were few opportunities for her to meet people. The shadchanim seemed to have no one for her. She ended up marrying a much older man whom she met through her mother-in-law. She married him for security, the chance for a family and for someone to help her take care of her mother-in-law. He may have not been her type, and I don't know if she loved him, but perhaps love really didn't matter under the circumstances.

She immigrated because she believed it would provide her with better economic prospects, and because she wanted to be part of a large Jewish community. This woman never received a Jewish education – she never attended a day school or a seminary – but she was proud of her Jewishness. She identified Judaism with kindness, positivity and decency. The reality of loneliness and even ruthlessness in a community that professes warmth and inclusion must have seemed so ironic to her.

Perhaps she even took such good care of her mother-in-law to prove something to herself and to God: that she could behave better than how she was treated.

The young woman's name was Ruth. She lived 3,000 years ago, and we read her story on Shavuot. May we merit her legacy of kindness, and may her positivity and decency serve as a model for all of us.

We can't forget what the Liberals did

By JERROLD LANDAU

School Parents SPEAK

Eighteen months have passed since the current provincial government cancelled the Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC), and there is no indication that it is prepared to offer an alternative solution to the inherent inequity in the funding of faith-based education in Ontario.

In the meantime, the tuition crisis in our Jewish day schools continues unabated. Families committed to Jewish education continue to bear the burden of tuition fees that often challenge their economic well-being, while other families continue to drop out of the system or avoid considering it in the first place.

While previous governments have also failed to address this inequity, this is the first government that has actively rescinded whatever provincial funding was available to non-Catholic faith-based schools – thus becoming the first to be guilty of a sin of commission in this regard.

This rescinding was done retroactively, which was punitive to those families who had already set their budgets with the assumption that such funding would exist. To add insult to injury, the government continues to portray this as an issue of the funding of "wealthy, elitist schools," callously ignoring the fact that many families with children in faith-based schools are struggling with their tuition fees. Meanwhile, Ontario continues to be the only jurisdiction in the free world that provides 100 per cent funding to the schools of one religion to the exclusion of all others.

All those who recognize the vital importance of intensive Jewish education to the cause of Jewish continuity expect our communal leadership to exert maximal pressure on the government to provide a solution to this discriminatory situation. Certainly, proper relations with the government must be maintained, but they must be conducted so as to make the community's extreme displeasure with the situation abundantly obvious.

When surveying the relationship between the community and the government over the past 18 months, a picture emerges of a community that is bending over backward to honour and extol the very government that has been acting in such bad faith toward their concerns regarding the funding of faith-based education.

Premier Dalton McGuinty has been featured at numerous communal events, including the recent TO'05 Young Leadership Conference, a meeting with the visiting Sephardi Chief Rabbi of Israel, and an event to honour Holocaust survivors. He will also be at the upcoming B'nai Brith Award of Merit Dinner this fall.

Greg Sorbara, the finance minister who was responsible for the budget that rescinded the EETC, was invited to the opening event of the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow campaign. And government leaders continue to express their greetings to the Jewish community at holiday times and in program booklets at communal events, as if they can define their relationship to our community with platitudes rather than substance.

The government's presence at any one of these events can be justified as a matter of protocol. However, when viewed together, it seems as if the community is relegating its duty to hold the government responsible for the rectification of this inequity to the background.

It gives government leaders the message that the issue is an irritant that is often raised by the Jewish leadership, but that failing to solve the problem will not damage their relationship with the community. No real incentive is provided for the government to remedy the situation.

But the wrong message goes well beyond the government. Members of the Jewish community at large, especially those who don't realize that the tuition crisis is striking deeply into the well-being of the middle class backbone of our community, are given the message that the tuition crisis in Jewish education is not a matter that requires urgent attention. They will casually accept the fact that some types of discrimination are tolerable in our society. Finally, those affected directly by the tuition crisis – both those who remain in the day school system and those who have opted out – are left wondering whether communal leaders really care about their realities of life.

I strongly urge the leadership of our community, across all organizations and affiliations, to work together to pressure the government as strongly as possible to remedy the discrimination that exists in the funding of denominational schools in Ontario. The rewards in enhancement of the Jewish experience in Ontario will then be theirs to reap for generations to come.

Jewish Life

Education for a new kind of society

We will soon reach the time of university graduations and commencement speeches.

Beyond the ritual of cap and gown and old-grad sentimentality lurks a paramount question: apart from the accumulation of facts and information, what perceptions and values have students received as they enter a complex and uncertain future?

Books
Bernard Baskin

1. Is there intellectual curiosity?

Truth often disturbs what makes us most comfortable. The tracking down of ideas involves greater risk than pouring facts into a receptacle called the brain. In the words of Lincoln Steffens, "It is dangerous to think – always." But the educated must take the risk.

Our age demands open-mindedness, unrelenting doubt and ceaseless probing of life's problems at every stage, with enough independence and flexibility to confront emerging and unprecedented dilemmas.

There must be an awareness of the vastness of human ignorance, and an appetite for learning that is satisfied only by life-long analysis and inquiry. Curious minds are able to surmount any kind of inadequate training.

2. Is there concern for the social ills of society?

Contemporary difficulties are explosive, increasingly numerous and perilously urgent.

Some examples? Race prejudice, which sabotages the struggle for peace and undermines the security and moral health of the world; political chauvinism, which in one country after another prefers unrest and disunity to mature compromise; emotional frustrations, that often lead to scapegoatism and group hostility; and hatred for an "enemy" nation, so violent that some people are more eager to see that enemy expunged than to keep their own children alive.

For the educated person, there is nothing harder than the softness of indifference.

3. Is there an appreciation for moral and esthetic values?

Where do we get our persistence to overcome setbacks and disappointments? Whence comes the impulse to aid our fellow men instead of striding over them in the struggle for personal success? Where is the wellspring for the voluntary offering of service to the community, to our neighbour?

The answer lies in non-material values that must be acquired along with knowledge in the educational process.

4. Is there proper humility?

An educated person is one whose mind is always watching itself. Shakespeare said, "Modest doubt is called the beacon of the wise." Bertrand Russell pointed out that the knowledge required of a scientist before he can do research in one technical area may expand to such proportions as to consume all the best years of his life.

Why then transmit simplistic explanations for the complex problems of society or for the supreme riddles of the universe? Changes in our age are so rapid that political and scientific revolutions occur within the span of a single lifetime. The youngest undergraduate has already witnessed greater political, industrial and social ferment than her or his pre-21st-century counterpart would have known in several generations.

5. Is there a critical method of evaluation?

It is obvious that we live in an age of an information explosion. But we are also in the middle of a misinformation explosion. With the proliferation of mass communications, we are surrounded by hawkers, pitchmen, hard and soft sells, persuaders hidden and overt. Bombarded daily with millions of words by print and electronic media, we need some kind of critical apparatus to decide whom and what to believe, and to what degree.

One of humankind's most profitable resources for progress and for peace is in the universities of the free world. To realize our potential, we must mould men and women of intellect and spirit. What a tremendous challenge it is to instil these five ideals into their hearts and minds.

Creating Torah scrolls

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The next time you're called up to the Torah and are concerned about reciting the blessings perfectly, you should know you have it easy. The sofer, the scribe who wrote that Torah, had to inscribe all 304,805 letters perfectly. This coming Monday, the first day of Shavuot, we read about the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai.

So today, we'll look at the incredible amount of work that goes into creating Torah scrolls – amazing creations that combine the art of calligraphy, the fine detail of Halachah and the secrets of Jewish mysticism. (Thanks to Michael Mirsky for the idea for today's column.)

A Jewish scribe is called a "Sofer STaM." Sofer because he literally counts the letters to make sure his work is perfect. STaM is a acronym for the major areas of work: sifrei Torah, tfillin and mezuzot. (More on the latter two in coming weeks.) [http://rabbiwein.com/column-888.html]

Today's sofrim have some pretty high standards to adhere to. According to a midrash, before Moses died, he wrote 13 Torah scrolls. He gave one to each tribe and placed the 13th scroll in the Holy Ark, along with the tablets from the Ten Commandments, "so that no one dare falsify the text of the scroll." If a single letter is incorrect, the Torah cannot be used for its holy purpose.

The Talmud tells us that Rabbi Yishmael once asked his student, Rabbi Meir, "My son, what is your profession?" Rabbi Meir replied, "I am a scribe." To this Rabbi Yishmael remarked, "My son, be scrupulous in your profession, for it is a heavenly pursuit, and should you delete one letter or add one letter, such effort is tantamount to destroying the entire world." (Eruvin 13a) [www.sofer.net/stam.htm]

Actually the 613th and final commandment is to write one's own copy of a sefer Torah. If you don't happen to be a scribe, there are many sofrim who will be happy to write one for you. But if you don't have $35,000 (US) or more to spare, you can still fulfill the mitzvah by contributing toward the writing of a Torah or just pitching in for the cost of a letter or two. [http://tinyurl.com/92zut]

As for those letters, there are complex laws concerning the shape of each of the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet, as well as the five final letters. To get an idea of how complicated the calligraphic laws can be, take a look at the safrus.com site, which has a graphic of each letter. The letter aleph has three distinct parts and 10 laws concerning its form. Even the yud, the smallest letter of the alphabet, has eight distinguishing features. [www.safrus.com/alphabet.html]

Some of those features have mystical origins. For example, the designs (taggim) that crown many of the letters are much more than ornamental squiggles. The kabbalistic book, the Zohar, "teaches us that the right tag, crown, represents God's attribute of mercy, while the left tag represents His attribute of justice. The right tag has to be taller than the left one, symbolizing God's mercy rising above His Justice." [www.hasofer.com/html/hiddurstam.html]

When you think of a sofer, the image may come to mind of a talented artisan intricately guiding that quill onto parchment. That picture is accurate. But it seems that in their spare time, many sofrim also have time to design websites, too. [www.mavensearch.com/subjects.asp?S=571]

The most impressive site that I have come across belongs to Mordechai Pinchas, who hails from Essex in southeast England. His 27-part Diary of a Sofer tells of his love of calligraphy and his journey to becoming a sofer. Although some challenges faced by sofrim haven't changed in centuries, contemporary scribes face some very modern tests. [www.bayit02.freeserve.co.uk/]

Here's what happened when Pinchas set out to create the d'yo, the kosher ink used by scribes. "One recipe calls for iron sulphate crystals and tannic acid. [My mentor] told me that I could get them at the chemist, so I went to the one around the corner. 'I know this might sound bit odd,' I say to the pharmacist, 'but I would like to buy some iron sulphate and tannic acid.' He informs me that it is now illegal to buy such chemicals over the counter as I might be making a bomb!" Pinchas eventually convinced a kind chemist that he's no terrorist and went on to complete his sefer Torah.

Toronto student wins National Bible Contest

David Pellow, winner of the National Bible Contest is hoisted on a chair following his victory.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The buses rolled in and the planes landed as 111 students from across the country descended upon Montreal to compete in the National Bible Contest.

Students from day and supplementary schools from Victoria, Winnipeg, Toronto, Hamilton and Ottawa joined 31 Montreal Hebrew day students for this much-anticipated annual event, which has been running for 46 years. Every year the contest alternates between Toronto and Montreal.

Toronto sent the largest number of children with 81 participants. The second-largest group came from Victoria, which sent a contingent of 12 supplementary school students. This was the largest group of supplementary students from any single city in Canada. There were six and two students from Winnipeg and Hamilton, respectively, and 10 from Ottawa.

All the participants had to pass a tough written exam to qualify for the contest or chidon, which is organized by the Canadian National Bible Contest committee, a joint venture of the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre (BJEC) in Montreal and the Toronto Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

Most of the contest was held at the Beth Zion Synagogue in Cote St. Luc. The shul opens its doors to the contestants every other year.

One of the highlights of the chidon was Rabbi Sydney Shoham's moving address about his recent trip to Auschwitz on the March of the Living.

He said when the Nazis murdered six million Jews they destroyed a way of life, which included an intensity of Torah learning. "What we lost is something that can never be returned." He told the students that by participating in the chidon, which involves a serious commitment to Torah study, "you are bringing back part of what was lost."

At the high school division of the National Bible Contest three winners – the top performers overall and one representative each from Montreal and Ontario – go on to compete in the international tournament in Israel.

Silvia Eilath, education consultant at the BJE, says Canadian participants are usually among the top 16 world finalists, and this year was no exception. Sarah Shainhouse and Josh Gutenberg (both from Toronto) and Sara Bordan (from Montreal) made the finals, with Shainhouse placing fifth and Gutenberg, eighth.

The national contest in Montreal was divided into five different categories – grades 5 and 6 Hebrew and English; grades 7 and 8 Hebrew and English; and grades 9 to 11 Hebrew. The largest single group was the grades 5 and 6 Hebrew division, which had 48 participants.

The contest generated a lot of excitement and suspense. First the students wrote two exams and from those results, the semi-finalists – 10 in each division – were chosen. Then the number was narrowed down to five for each division in the final round of questions. Prizes were given for first-, second- and third-place winners in each division.

The big winner at the high school level was David Pellow from Yeshivat Ohr Chaim of Toronto. He came first overall and will represent Canada. In second place, Yisrael Witty, also of Ohr Chaim, will represent Ontario, while Moshe Cohen, from Hebrew Academy of Montreal, will be the Quebec representative. Binyamin Walfish, an independent student from Toronto, placed third.

The winners of the English Supplementary School division for grades 5 and 6 were Kassandra Loewen (Bet Sefer Solel, Toronto), first; Ian Kapron-King (Temple Emanuel, Victoria); and David Kitai (Temple Kol Ami, Toronto), second; and Matthew Silverstein (Downtown Jewish Community School, Toronto), third.

The winners of the grades 5 and 6 Hebrew Division were Sarah Marcus (Eitz Chaim, Toronto), first; Courtney Firestone (United Synagogue Day School, Toronto), second; and Jonathan Sebag (United Talmud Torahs, Montreal), third.

The winners of the grades 7 and 8 Hebrew Division were Josh Satok (Associated Hebrew Schools Toronto), first; Leo Katz (Associated), second; and Stephanie Glowinsky (Netivot HaTorah, Toronto), third.

Yonatan Clark (Temple Emanuel, Victoria) won the only prize awarded in the grades 7 and 8 English division.

Shlomo Shimon, executive director of the BJEC and the ombudsman for the chidon, was assisted in the organization of the event by Helene Kaufman, BJEC assistant executive director; Arlazar Eliashiv, Montreal contest co-ordinator; and Eilath, contest co-ordinator from the Toronto BJE.

Marty Lockshin, a judge for the contest both at the national and local levels, was assisted by some previous chidon participants and national winners Yoni Halperin of Toronto and Montrealers Abby Brown, Carolyn Gehr, Sara Ronis and Dalia Rotstein.

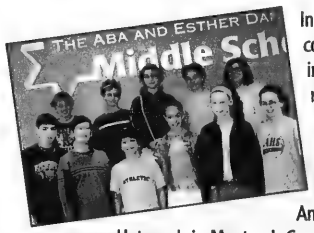
Associated Celebrates Danilack's National Success

Students at Associated's Danilack Middle School are showing their stuff and coming out on top in Canada in both General and Judaic studies.



In the Canadian National Mathematics League, an annual math contest in which 467 schools competed, our Grade 6s placed Top 10 in Canada and Top 5 in Ontario. Danilack student, Marky Freeman, received a perfect score and tied for first in the country.

And, at the national Chidon Hatanach in Montreal, Grade 8 student, Josh Satok, placed first, and Grade 7 student Leo Katz, placed second in their categories. Many of our students placed in the Top 10.

The Aba and Esther Danilack Middle School is Toronto's only independently housed Jewish Middle School. At Danilack, we are creating a unique environment in which students are challenged and inspired academically and being given the preparation they need to excel in their high school careers. Outside of academics, our students excel as well -- our girls' basketball team recently placed first in the Jewish Day School League. All of this in an environment where kids are living and learning Jewish values while creating lasting memories and making life-long friendships.

Reconstructionist workshop reinforces participatory approach

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Two rabbis from the Reconstructionist movement's headquarters in Philadelphia were in Toronto last month to run a leadership workshop that was the first of its kind in Canada.

Rabbi Shawn Zevit, Canadian-born director of outreach & external affiliations for the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation – the movement's synagogue arm – and Rabbi Fredi Cooper, JRF's director of affiliate services, spent a weekend with about two dozen lay leaders and potential leaders of Darchei Noam, Toronto's only Reconstructionist synagogue, as well as two participants from Buffalo, N.Y.

The workshop, called "Exploring Reconstructionism: A Leadership Approach," focused on community building and policy development using an approach called "values based decision making (VBDM)," which reflects Jewish values and Reconstructionist philosophy. It has been run for seven years in the United States.

"It's a real challenge to do things in a way that includes the largest number of people, but it's also tremendously rewarding when you're able to go through the process and come to a decision that most people are delighted with," said workshop participant Rona Kosansky, secretary of Darchei Noam's board. "It's a real community-building process."

The seminars are designed to respond to each congregation's individual needs, said Rabbi Zevit, who was involved in educational theatre in Toronto before he entered rabbinical school 12 years ago.

For the event in Toronto, part of the focus was on Darchei Noam's $3 million capital campaign, in light of its purchase last September of Adath Sholom Congregation's building. The 30-year-old, 300-family congregation has been meeting in the B'nai Brith Canada building on Hove Street since 1989.

The workshop, in fact, was created in response to a growth trend in the movement.

Thirty per cent of Reconstructionist congregations have been building buildings within the last decade, and the movement has been growing by 10 per cent a year, Rabbi Zevit said.

Although there are only three formally affiliated Reconstructionist congregations in Canada (in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal), they are among 105 altogether, mostly in the United States, and including one in Prague and another in Curacao.

One of the things that distinguishes Reconstructionism – a liberal, egalitarian movement developed by Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan over the middle years of the 20th century – is that rabbis work with congregants to educate them in order to develop policies, instead of imposing standards themselves, said Rabbi Cooper, who has a background in education and as a therapist.

"Our rabbis work with the community to enhance participation and empower people," said Rabbi Zevit. "We work more on a partnership level."

Rabbi Zevit, who was born in Winnipeg but moved to Toronto at age 10, was a founder of Kehillat Ahavat Hesed, a now-defunct egalitarian congregation where he led services every other Shabbat.

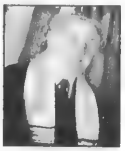
OBITUARY



CANTOR SOLOMON GISSER

Cantor Solomon Gisser, Cantor of Shaare Zion Congregation of Montreal for nearly half a century, passed away in Montreal on April 19, 2005, at the age of 86.

Cantor Gisser was born in Warsaw, Poland, and later moved with his family to Lodz. He received an intensive traditional education in the schools and yeshivot of his native land, and, as a young boy, was renowned in Lodz as a soloist with some of the foremost synagogue choirs of that city. As a young man, he also conducted the Lodz Ghetto's famed Hazomir choir for the High Holy Days of 1940.

Cantor Gisser and his brother Meyer (who predeceased him in Israel in 1976) volunteered to work in the German labour camps in 1941, unaware that this was the first step in a four-year ordeal that took them to a variety of Nazi concentration camps, including Auschwitz and Buchenwald from which Cantor Gisser was liberated in April 1945.

Cantor Gisser completed his musical education at the Heidelberger Hochschule Fur Musik in Germany, after which he officiated as Cantor in Heidelberg, Mannheim, Amsterdam and Rotterdam. Upon arrival in Canada in 1952, Cantor Gisser was engaged as Hazzan of Shaare Zion Congregation where he served until his retirement, as Cantor Emeritus, in 1997. As Cantor of that congregation, he established an uncompromising standard of excellence for hazzanut and synagogue music which became manifest in synagogue services whose spirituality, beauty and dignity became renowned throughout North America.

During his career in the cantorate, Cantor Gisser concertized extensively in Montreal, and throughout Canada, United States, Israel and Europe, performing varied programs including hazzanut, Yiddish lieder, Hebrew melodies, other forms of liturgical music, and opera. He made a number of recordings of his music, and in 2000, published his autobiography. The Cantor's Voice, describing his experiences in pre-war Poland and during the Holocaust. Cantor Gisser also promoted, introduced and supported the music of other outstanding composers, musicians and singers of liturgical and non-liturgical Jewish music.

Cantor Gisser's excellence as both Hazzan and musician were equaled by his humanity, kindness, generosity and pastoral qualities, and he was much sought after by a multitude of Jewish and secular organizations to whom he regularly lent his many talents.

Cantor Gisser's work earned him numerous honours from a variety of organizations and institutions, and in 2002, in New York City, was conferred the degree of Doctor of Music, Honoris Causa, by the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

Cantor Gisser was predeceased by his wife, the late Anna Gisser in 1992. He is survived by his daughter, Helen Burrows of Boynton Beach, FL. (son-in-law Michael Burrows, granddaughter Dr. Sara Bernstein and Glen Bernstein; great-granddaughters, Anna and Gina Bernstein); his son, David Gisser of Winnipeg, Manitoba (daughter-in-law Justice Freda Steel, grandson Jason Gisser, and granddaughter Meira Gisser); his brothers Cantor Hyman Gisser (Zippora) and Sam Gisser of Montreal; and by many nieces and nephews.

Funeral services for Cantor Gisser took place at the Shaare Zion Congregation in Montreal on April 21st, followed by interment at the Shaare Zion Congregation Section,, Eternal Gardens Cemetery, Beaconsfield, Qc. Rabbi Lionel E. Moses officiated, together with Cantors Boaz Davidoff, Eric Moses, and Gideon Zelermyer, and the Shaare Zion Choir under the direction of Mr. Lou Burko.

The family wishes to express hearfelt thanks to Queenie Climan and Riva Rauch for their caring support and friendship. Special thanks as well to Belle Maclan, and the administrative and medical staff of the Palliative Care Department, Mount Sinai Hospital of Montreal, for their care and compassion.

Contributions in Memory of Cantor Gisser may be made to the "Cantor Solomon Gisser and Anna Gisser Memorial Fund", C/O Shaare Zion Congregation, 5575 Cote St. Luc Road, Montreal, Quebec, H3X 2C9; (514) 481-7727.

The Jewish Education Report

Jewish Studies Start Early in the Kobrin family

By Suzanne Wintrob

No matter what preschool her students attended, Grade One Hebrew teacher Sharon Goldfarb knows it won't take her long to get them excited about Jewish learning.

"When they get to my class, the children already have a good background," says Goldfarb of Associated Hebrew School's (AHS) Posluns campus. "They know a lot of words and some of the songs. And for those who didn't go to a Jewish preschool, their minds are open and it isn't hard for them to get into the groove. The transition is only a few days."

These days, more parents are considering Jewish pre-schools and many children are graduating from Jewish kindergartens to Jewish elementary schools.

Parent Lisa Kobrin, for example, has two children at the AHS Kamin campus in Thornhill: a daughter just finishing Grade Two and another daughter finishing Senior Kindergarten. Come September, she'll be enrolling her youngest son there, as well, where he'll attend nursery school.

When their oldest was ready to start her formal education, day school was the only option the Kobrins considered. Her transition from preschool to Grade One was particularly easy because she had the basics covered. She knew about Shabbat and the Jewish holidays and was familiar with basic stories and songs that went along with the Jewish calendar. She could recognize Hebrew letters and knew some basic Hebrew vocabulary. Her classmates did, too.

Grade One was an extension of all that. By the end of the year she knew Shacharit, the daily morning prayer, and was familiar with additional prayers as well. Fridays were devoted to Shabbat festivities and the telling of Parshat HaShavuah (the weekly Bible portion). Her Hebrew language skills expanded tremendously through phonetic reading, conversations, stories and songs. The highlight of the year was a special Shacharit service she led with her fellow Grade One graduates, at which they were all presented with their very own Siddur.

"Most students coming into Grade One don't speak Hebrew," explains Goldfarb. "Some do have some background so it eases their language acquisition, but it's not so much that if somebody doesn't know Hebrew they can't get it or feel bad. It's the routine of every day – they talk and then they build on it as the year goes on."

It's the dedication of the educational staff that makes it work. Says Kobrin, "I've been very happy with how my children have proceeded from grade to grade. They have very loving teachers."

Although Mrs. Kobrin speaks little Hebrew, her husband Shaun is an AHS graduate and speaks the language well. Still, they investigated their options before enrolling their eldest in a Jewish day school and urge other parents to do the same.

"Make sure the school you choose is good for your family," says Mrs. Kobrin, a class parent and preschool literacy coach. "What are your values? What information do you want your children to have? By choosing something that fits your family, you can help your child make an easier transition from preschool to day school."

Born to Teach CHAT's classroom sisterhood

When Anna Urowitz-Freudenstein was studying at New York's Jewish Theological Seminary several years ago, for an MA in Ancient Judaism and a PhD in Midrash (Biblical Interpretation), she had every intention of becoming a university professor one day.

But when she and her husband decided it was time to leave the Big Apple and move closer to her family in Toronto, she had no idea what her job prospects would be. So she did what came naturally: she called upon her younger sister for advice.

Rachel Urowitz is a lecturer at both York University and the University of Toronto and a U of T PhD candidate specializing in Judaism in the Greco-Roman period. She was also a Jewish history teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) graduate. Like Anna, Rachel had planned on becoming an academic. But one day she was called on to take over a CHAT Jewish history class mid-year when a teacher fell ill, and she simply fell in love with the day school scene and stayed on. Eight years later she is a mainstay of the Jewish history department, having written and revised several of the curriculum sourcebooks.

Anna Urowitz Freudenstein (l) and Rachel Urowitz

When Anna came along asking for advice on Toronto area academic postings, Rachel told her to give high school a try. Anna was hesitant but put in a call to CHAT anyway. Before she knew it she was on staff for the inaugural year of the Richmond Hill campus and has since spent three years at the Tannenbaum campus. Her specialties are Rabbinics, Tanach, Jewish history and Jewish ethics.

While they may have experienced the usual sibling rivalry growing up, the Urowitz sisters maintain a strong bond when it comes to their students' well being. They have taught the same courses, sometimes at the exact same time, and regularly bounce ideas off each other and then introduce the concepts into the classroom. They each have their specialty – Anna's is Midrash and text while Rachel's is the historical investigation of the ancient Jewish period with an emphasis on archaeology – and so they often interpret passages in different ways, making for interesting conversation and debate. Rachel has picked up on Anna's fascination with Web-based learning and introduced it to her students.

"We each know that we have our own bent, our own niche" says Rachel, who recently had her second child. "We don't step on each other's feet that way. I've never felt as though Anna was trying to hone in on my material. We're close enough in topic that we have things to talk about and confer with but we have different approaches. There's never any feeling of, 'how come you stole my material or my approach?'" Being CHAT graduates themselves, both Rachel and Anna initially found it odd to be eating their lunch alongside some of their former teachers. But when they both became CHAT teachers, having a sister nearby was particularly calming.

"We respect each other's space and so it works out well," says Rachel. "Anna works in Jewish history as well as in other departments so she spreads herself a little differently than I do. We have a chance to work together but we're not solely always placed together. We have some freedom to be our own people."

Adds Anna: "I miss Rachel now that she's on maternity leave. It's very nice and comforting to have a sister in the staff room with you."

School Year Marked by innovative initiatives

How do you get a kid excited about school? Give him a project he can really sink his teeth into. And that's exactly what several schools did this year.

United Synagogue Day School's Grade 7 class focused on the Jewish lifecycle. Students explored different issues from birth to bat/bar mitzvah, including traditions and rituals, and then delved into their own bat or bar mitzvahs and their Shoreshim (Jewish roots). The computer-based project was designed to help students discover who they are, where they came from, and what shaped them into the people they are today.

The project began with students examining their own names and how they came to be. Then they created a family tree, complete with photos of various family events. They crafted their own identity cards by thinking of who they are and how they perceived their identities. They explored mitzvot that are important to them and how they will contribute to others as part of their bat or bar mitzvah celebrations. They learned about their parsha (Torah portion) and figured out how it relates to their lives. They designed an interactive map illustrating the migration of their families to Canadian soil and they interview a grandparent about how he or she celebrated his bat or bar mitzvah.

"This project enabled our students to reconnect to their family roots through dialogue with their parents and grandparents – to inquire, to learn, and to unfold their family stories," says Amiel Sabari, Director of Jewish Studies at USDS. In their explorations, the students rediscovered their families. In fact, to our surprise one student was able to trace his family back to the 18th century."

Or HaEmet Day School was also a buzz of innovative activity this year. Through its Mishnayot L'Hatzalat Nefashot (Mishna To Save Souls) program, 70 students in Grade Four to Eight, led by school principal Sarah Wasserman and Hebrew principal Sara Cohen, spent the past year studying sacred texts in class and independently in exchange for points.

The school matched one dollar for every point and raised $3,000 for Ezer Mizion, which provides medical assistance and social services not only for Israel's sick, disabled and elderly populations but also for all people in crisis. The children presented a giant cheque to Ezer Mizion at a special ceremony, attended by Rabbi Amram Assayag, the Sephardic Chief Rabbi of Ontario. The organization, in turn, presented the students with a plaque to say thank you.

Students at Or Haemet donate a large cheque to Ezer Mizion

What made the project particularly heartwarming for the children was the learning that took place in memory of one of their friends. Michael Zuk, a Grade 6 student, died of cancer at the beginning of the school year and the tragedy affected the entire student body very deeply. His parents also attended the ceremony.

Moving On. The Class of 2004

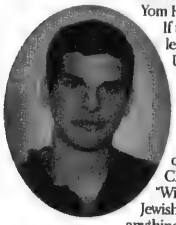
By Suzanne Wintrob

By the end of this month, close to 550 students will have graduated from Toronto's Jewish high schools. They are an impressive bunch, having spent the past four years absorbing as much as they possibly can about their Jewish heritage, excelling at general studies and making lifelong friends along the way. Now, as they embark on the next step in their life journey, they share their feelings about moving on.

Matthew Friedman, 18

Graduate of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Richmond Hill Campus

When Matthew Friedman first arrived at CHAT Richmond Hill fresh out of United Synagogue Day School's Bayview Avenue campus, he knew he wanted to be involved in more than just studying. His first foray into extra-curricular activity was the Grade 9 school play, serving as its assistant director and subsequently acting as assistant producer and head of playbill. By Grade 10 he had signed on as a peer counsellor to help his fellow students with family problems and other troubling issues. He tutored younger students in various subjects, served as Grade 11 student council rep, and worked on a number of special events for Yom Hashoah and Yom Hazikaron.



Matthew Friedman

If that weren't enough, Matthew took on leadership roles outside of school with United Synagogue Youth (USY) and National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) – all the while maintaining good grades.

"Having a day school education has really allowed me to find myself and my community," says Matthew, who calls his CHAR years a life altering experience. "Without the Jewish experience and a Jewish school, I wouldn't be involved in anything. I've opened myself up to the community and it has given me an opportunity to learn about Judaism and find my place in the Jewish world."

Going to day school has also hooked him up with likeminded teenagers: "The friends I've made are pretty awesome. They're 100% genuine. They're not there just to go to school and get out. We work together to make it the place that it is."

Matthew is soon setting off to Israel for a year of Jewish learning at Yeshivat Maaleh Adumim near Jerusalem. After that he plans to study science and engineering at the University of Toronto. His dream is to carve out a career path that combines all of those subjects.

Zippi Shulman, 18

Graduate of Ulpanat Orot

From Israel to Calgary to Toronto and now back to Israel. That's Zippi Shulman's life so far.

The eldest of five children, Zippi was born in Israel to an American father and an Australian mother. When she was five years old, the family moved to Calgary where her father, Rabbi Moshe Shulman, took up a position at Calgary's House of Jacob-Mikvah Israel synagogue and Zippi attended the Akiva Academy day school. They moved again when she was 11, this time to Toronto where her dad took the helm at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation and they enrolled Zippi and her siblings at Eitz Chaim day school.

Zippi Shulman

This year, Zippi is on the move solo. She's off to Israel to spend a year at Michlala Jerusalem College for Women and hopes to make aliyah in the near future.

"I'm looking forward to being in Israel but also to learn more texts in detail and broaden my knowledge," says the Ulpanat Orot graduate. "I hope to go to university there, too, and study education. I want to teach Tanach and Jewish history, but I really like the sciences so maybe I'll combine biology, physics and Tanach."

While at Ulpanat Orot, Zippi helped organized Friday afternoon programs and regular study sessions for the entire school. She made it to the national championship of the Bible contest in Grades 9, 10 and 11 and visited public schools to teach Holocaust education.

"The person you are is based on the home you come from, and Jewish education supplements that," she says. "A lot of who I am and where I want to be is due to the Jewish education I've received."

David Zvi Epstein, 17

Graduate of Or Chaim Yeshiva

David Zvi Epstein has two views about going to day school. "It's important in that you're around people who think like you, who act like you, and the things you hold dear are reinforced through the people around you," he says. "But at the same time, sometimes it's a little bit of a shock when you go out into the rest of the world and you see that it's a very different place."

David Zvi has experienced that dichotomy this year, in particular as a member of Or Chaim Yeshiva's Holocaust Education program. Together with his fellow students, David Zvi visited a number of public and Catholic high schools in the city – wearing his kippa, of course – and brought the Holocaust alive through songs and stories. Some of the kids they spoke to had never met a Jew before, he recalls, and many were emotionally affected by the presentations.

David Zvi has accomplished much in his high school days. He was editor of the school yearbook. He helped organize this year's community-wide Yom Hazikaron program and read his poem The Siren to the audience. Last year the avid photographer had an exhibition based on the Shma prayer at a downtown café. He and his classmate Hillel Nadler were one of only 26 North American students awarded a Bronfman Youth Fellowship and together they spent last summer in Israel studying various Jewish topics and meeting with Knesset members.

He'll be spending this summer working alongside professors at Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science and will stay on for the year at Yeshivat Maaleh Gilboa. Then he'll head off to Montreal's McGill University and hopes to teach one day.

"I think I'm ready to move on to a new part of my life," he says.

Anna Neuman, 17

Graduate of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Tannenbaum Campus

Anna Neuman's transition from She'arim Hebrew Day School to CHAT was anything but easy.

"It has been a roller coaster of challenges but also of triumphs," recalls Anna, who attended United Synagogue Day School prior to the special education-focused She'arim. "Grade 9 was a transition year for me, both socially and academically. It was a community-based school so people were very friendly and I didn't have many problems making friends. But academically it was a huge transition because of the workload."

But Anna was determined to make things work and, they did, thanks to CHAT's caring guidance and mediation departments and her own efforts. She was taken under CHAT's wing and fit in with the dedicated teachers who understood her learning style and helped her succeed. She attended special education classes for her difficult subjects like math and science but chose regular stream for her best subjects like English and geography. She became a peer counsellor, helping Grade 9 students transition to high school, and was involved in the school play and various committees.

Given the increase in antisemitism at Canadian universities and colleges, Anna says she's glad her day school education provided a strong sense of Jewish identity. She'll be spending the summer in Israel and then attending York University's Faculty of Arts in the fall.

Supplementary Schools nurture Jewish learning

Ellen Mervin had always wanted a Jewish education. But her parents, who weren't observant, believed that Jewish learning was only for boys and so they sent her brother to Hebrew school instead. He quit after his bar mitzvah and never went back. When Ellen eventually married, she found out her husband had done the same.

When the Mervins had their first child, Tamara, Hebrew school was far from their minds. But history repeated itself, with Tamara showing an interest after attending various Jewish camps and seeing her friends sign up for after-school learning. Ellen and her husband Earl were surprised but thrilled.

"We have always given, and continue to give, our children whatever experiences they've needed and wanted in order to grow, whether it has been dance lessons or swimming lessons or learning the oboe," says Ellen, who still belongs to the Kiever shul. "If that's what they wanted to pursue, they were given that opportunity. When they said Hebrew school, I immediately said, 'Not my children. Why do you need this?' And then my parents reminded me that I had wanted to go and hadn't. So I found one for them."

Gary Waters, on the other hand, had attended Hebrew school as a child and always knew he would send his kids one day, too. He and his wife, Ruth Goldman, are members of Temple Sinai Congregation and so the synagogue's 50-year-old supplementary school was a natural for their three children. The school, with 150 preschoolers and 350 students in Grades 1-12, provides family education programs, leadership skills and teacher training programs for high schoolers, in addition to trips and visiting speakers.

"They get a nice well-rounded set of influences," says Waters. "They learn to read Hebrew and understand it. They apply that to the prayers and the liturgy so they're familiar with the service at our synagogue. They learn about Israel, which is important to us. They learn about good work, tzedakah of various kinds, and Jewish culture."

Adam Waters, now in Grade 8, admits he's in it as much for the trips as for the Jewish education and the camaraderie. His class went to Ottawa and spoke to MPs about Israel and gathered at Camp George for an action-packed retreat. Still, Hebrew school has taught him a great deal about his heritage, his people and his religion, and has fostered a strong Jewish identity. The experience has been so stimulating that Adam and a number of his friends have chosen to continue their supplementary school education beyond their bar and bat mitzvahs.

"It prepares you for what's to come in life," says Adam who will be representing his Grade 9 class in Temple Sinai's Senior Youth Group next year.

For the Mervins, sending their kids to Toronto's independent Ahavat Yisrael supplementary school, which conducts Sunday morning classes for 680 students on two campuses, has added a whole new Jewish dimension to the household. Shabbat and Jewish holidays now have more meaning and family discussions revolve around Jewish topics.

"Every time they came home they were teaching me," recalls Ellen of the early years. "It brought a whole new atmosphere into the house."

Tamara and her siblings Miriam and Benjamin have all been through the seven-year program. Tamara, 17, returned as a volunteer once she graduated. Now Rachel, the youngest, is in her final year and will soon celebrate her bat mitzvah at the school's special ceremony and dinner. Her older siblings are excited about seeing Rachel follow in their footsteps.

"At my bat mitzvah I told a story about taking things one step at a time," says Tamara. "That's what I told my little sister, to keep going and keep learning, that it is a good experience to go to Hebrew school because then you learn about your culture and you learn about your religion, which is really important."

Parents sought answers at USDS meeting

Board to meet with Richmond Hill parents

And although most parents seemed to understand the need for the restructuring, emotions were running high.

One Richmond Hill parent asked whether the board would work with Richmond Hill and Bayview parents to find a way "to allow people to transition in a humane manner – not in an impossible manner by commuting an hour-and-a-half at rush hour down Bayview – to the new campus?"

Goldberg didn't have an answer, but he said the board will meet with Richmond Hill parents on ideas to make the transition as smooth as possible.

This response didn't seem to appease one Bayview parent, who felt that having one USDS campus in Richmond Hill and one south of Eglinton would cause a rift in the Jewish community.

He said that because Jews who live further south are usually more affluent than those up north, the restructuring will "accelerate the negative process of ghettoization" in the community.

But Gales said neither Bayview nor Richmond Hill are attracting new students to junior and senior kindergarten and Grade 1, while the Bathurst branch's population has remained stable. As well, he said, the Bathurst and Bayview campuses are relatively close to each other, meaning they compete for students.

Amid threats to pull children out of the school and complaints about the board's failure to communicate the changes well, commuting was the major concern for many parents, who said they didn't have time to sit in rush hour traffic.

At some points, all Gales could do was listen to complaints and apologize for the inconvenience parents would experience.

"On behalf of the board, we sincerely understand and deeply regret the pain, disruption and frustration the parents are feeling. The board has not taken this plan lightly," Gales said.

Eitz Chaim to merge with Thornhill Talmud Torah

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

USDS is not the only Jewish day school undergoing big changes in the coming years.

Earlier this spring, Eitz Chaim Day School announced that its boys division would be merging with the three-year-old Thornhill Talmud Torah.

As of next September, Talmud Torah students will call Eitz Chaim's Patricia campus home, to combat a decrease in enrolment "and other financial constraints" being experienced at Eitz Chaim, said Rabbi Isser Pliner, the Judaic studies principal of Eitz Chaim on Patricia Avenue.

"The student population [at Eitz Chaim] has been decreasing, and it seems the enrolment has gone down. This has caused a tightening of the belts," Rabbi Pliner said.

In 1992, Eitz Chaim, an 85-year-old Orthodox day school, boasted 1,100 students. Today, the school has less than 700 children, and the boys division has dropped to 300.

Rabbi Pliner said Talmud Torah, which has 64 boys, also had to think about the future.

Although the two schools had different educational philosophies on the surface, parents with children in both schools have the same goals, he said.

Talmud Torah had a more intensive Jewish studies program than Eitz Chaim, but with the merger, Rabbi Pliner said, there is going to be a "major effort" to work out any philosophical differences the two schools had in the past.

He said the new Eitz Chaim boys division will adopt the Maharal educational approach used by Talmud Torah. The method holds that Torah, Mishnah and Gemarah should be taught one after the other, not simultaneously, as has been the case up to now at Eitz Chaim.

Rabbi Pliner said the Maharal approach, which is gaining in popularity among Orthodox schools, makes more sense and some parents had already asked that Eitz Chaim adopt the approach.

He said he doesn't know whether the merger will attract new students, but added that location has very little to do with why families choose Eitz Chaim. At the Patricia campus, very few kids come from the area, he said. Students come from both north and south of the campus.

Rabbi Pliner said he is very excited about the merger, but he knows it may be tough to swallow for some parents.

"Parents of both schools are trying to adjust to the idea. We've seen normal reactions to change. They feel they're losing what they were, but what they may become could be very good," Rabbi Pliner said.

Gan Yeladim Day Care to hold 25-year reunion

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Strange as it seems now, founders of a non-profit kosher day-care centre in the 1970s faced attempts to discourage their efforts because some members of the established Jewish community felt that Jewish women don't – or shouldn't – work.

But the small grassroots group persisted, opening Gan Yeladim – a government-licensed, kosher day care – at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in 1980 with money raised from private donations.

On June 12, the centre will mark its 25th anniversary with a celebration including a barbecue, carnival, silent auction and games. Alumni, parents, founders and staff will take part in the event from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. at the adjacent Irving Chapley Park, or at the synagogue in the case of bad weather.

There will be no admission charge, but funds raised from activities – most notably the creation of a tile wall for permanent display – will be used to "enhance the day care and to keep the fees as affordable as possible," said supervisor Shelley Wise, who noted that she is only one of several long-term staff.

Founding board member coming from Montreal

The 23-year Gan Yeladim veteran said the centre was small when she started. "Now there are 15 toddlers, age 18 months to 2½ years, and 46 preschoolers."

Founding board member Dorothy Lipovenko is "so proud," she said. She will travel from Montreal specifically for the event. "It's wonderful to know that little kids get a great start because of Gan Yeladim."

As a reporter at the Globe and Mail in the '70s, Lipovenko witnessed societal changes, including an increase in the number of two-parent-working families and the number of single parents who needed day care.

At the same time, she said, Toronto's Jewish community was "exploding" in numbers and had similar needs. "It just seemed like a glaring omission that the Jewish community in Toronto didn't have a kosher day care."

Penny Appelton, an original member of Lipovenko's committee, "just loved the idea" when she found out about it as a new mother on maternity leave.

Appelton, a social worker with Jewish Family & Child Service who used to direct the Early Learning Centre at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute (now Ryerson University), was involved in curriculum development for the fledgling centre. "It was important that we had a lot of Hebrew words, and songs in both Hebrew and English. Shabbat was important. All the rituals were there. It became part of the children's daily routine."

Alumna Marissa Barnartt, an 18-year-old human resources student at Seneca College and a member of the reunion committee, has a long involvement with the centre, including helping out when she was a Grade 9 student doing her required volunteer hours.

"I'm very excited [about the reunion]," she said.

Now you see it, now you don't. Jacob Rosen shed his locks on Lag b'Omer.

Students shed their locks for tzedakah

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

It took Jacob Rosen about 2½ years to grow his golden locks nearly an entire foot. Jonah Babins spent six months getting his dark brown curls to stretch six squiggly inches.

But on Lag b'Omer, Jacob and Jonah, both students at Associated Hebrew Schools, brushed their long strands a final time, before it was snipped away for tzedakah.

Jacob, 10, donated his hair to Locks for Love, an organization that provides hair to children who have suffered hair loss due to illness. Jonah, 10, shed his curls to raise money for cancer research.

"I learned in school about Terry Fox and I thought that how he raised money for cancer research was a great thing," said Jonah, who asked for $2 donations for his haircut. At the time of his interview with The CJN, Jonah raised more than $600.

"I felt that if [Fox] did something that the whole world knows about... then I can get as many people as I can to help out."

Jacob said he didn't initially put much thought into letting his hair cascade indefinitely, but when friends introduced him to the idea of Locks for Love, he jumped at the opportunity.

"I'm really happy that I'm doing it," he said. "I think it's a good cause."

Not surprisingly, the boys' parents are elated about their sons' endeavours.

"We're just so extremely proud of him... This is all his doing," says Jonah's mother Sylvia.

"The Terry Fox story really got into his system and he just felt that if Terry Fox did his part, he will do his."

Jacob's father, Harold, said his son is learning a valuable lesson from the endeavour.

"I'm happy he's learning to help other people," he said. "It's a very nice thing."

As for the end of a hair era, Jacob had mixed feelings.

"I'm pretty scared and excited at the same time," he said before his haircut. "It will feel weird."

Jacob's school chums looked on as his hair was cut at Associated's Neptune Campus.

Jonah's curls were buzzed away at Associated's Thornhill Campus before a gathering of students.

He noted that everyone who donated to the cause signed a piece of paper.

"I'm giving the piece of paper with everybody's name so the people at the cancer society can see all of the people who gave money," Jonah explained.

He said he has also donated the proceeds from jewelry he designed and sold, as well as magic shows he performed at his school, to Terry Fox Cancer Research.

Jonah Babins spent six months getting his curly hair to the right length before having it sheared off on Lag b'Omer.

Student honoured for Darfur work

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Students from STAND (Students Taking Action Now: Darfur) presented a petition in Ottawa last month. On Parliament Hill, from left, are Josh Fisher of Concordia University, Alexandra Zalucky of the University of Toronto, Jonathan Laski and Ben Fine, both students at the University of Western Ontario.

Ben Fine, who has just completed his final year of chemical engineering at the University of Western Ontario and is headed for graduate school at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT), recently became the first student to receive London Jewish Campus Services' Righteous Hand Award and Scholarship.

The award, which was created to recognize social action initiatives by an individual student each year, was the brainchild of UWO student Elias Parker, a recipient of Birthright Israel's prestigious Charlie award and a Hillel intern this past year. Parker, who has also been involved in advocacy and social action, used his Charlie award grant money to start the Righteous Hand award.

Partners in creating the Righteous Hand award include the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Family Foundation, Birthright Israel, Western Hillel, the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS), AEPi – Western chapter, London Jewish Campus Services, Ve'ahavta – The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, and Chabad of Western.

Fine, 22, co-founded STAND (Students Taking Action Now: Darfur) earlier this year with McGill University student Meredith Herman, and headed up a campaign and fundraiser to help people in Darfur.

His award of $600 will be put toward the national organization. At least half the money is to be directed toward the cause the student is supporting, according to the terms of the award.

STAND (www.standcanada.org) has representatives on 18 campuses across the country, said Fine. It was a student-initiated outgrowth of CFJS's One Weekend Jewish student conference held in January in Montreal.

"One of the speakers happened to be Darfur-related," said Fine. Having been involved in Darfur-related activism with students from a variety of ethnic and religious backgrounds through Hillel's political action committee and Western United: Step Up for Sudan since September, he had a particular interest in the subject. About 30 students in all – among them Fine and Herman – spent an evening at the conference brainstorming about Darfur instead of going out partying, he said.

From the end of February until Apr. 7, STAND ran a campaign called "10,000 Canadian Voices: A Difference for Darfur."

A rally in London attended by about 200 people commemorated the 11th anniversary of the Rwandan genocide. In Montreal, the group organized a benefit concert, while at Dalhousie University, students raised more than $4,000 at a gala to build schools for children in southern Sudan.

"It was all part of this 10,000 Canadian Voices. We gathered 10,000 signatures demanding Canadian leadership in bringing an end to the ongoing atrocities in Darfur," said Fine. "The campaign culminated in a press conference last month on Parliament Hill, when we presented the petition to five members of Parliament."

The students had an unexpected opportunity to meet with Prime Minister Paul Martin, who sat down and talked with them for half an hour, said Fine.

What motivates them? In Fine's case, he said it was the March of the Living, in which he participated as a high school student at Forest Hill Collegiate Institute. "I felt a sense of responsibility to speak out and take action against ethnically motivated conflict, wherever it may be and whomever it may affect.

"The lesson of never again is something we as Jews have the responsibility to speak out for, when something like that is happening to anyone else."

LISA SUZANNE CORISTINE ז"ל 1975-2004

Darling Lisa - It's hard to believe that a year has passed since we were able to hold your hand and kiss your sweet face. It has been a tough year, filled with many tears and much sorrow. Although the pain seems endless, it is mixed with more and more moments of bittersweet joy and enormous pride as we share our Lisa stories and learn of how special you were to all the people whose lives you touched. We often find ourselves wondering how you are filling your time now – lunch with Cleopatra or Henry V111, perhaps writing poetry with Mattie Stepanek. You are with us every moment of every day and we do our best to make you smile down on us with pride. Your little niece Maddie is told constant stories about her Auntie Lisa and has your special blanket to keep her safe. You have inspired us all to be better people and in return we have kept your dreams alive like "The Braveheart Foundation" and your schools and students have honored you with English Awards and special plaques. We wish we could change the outcome of your illness and have you with us – but, we all believe you are in a wonderful paradise and that someday we will all be re-united. With love from your family and many friends.

Israeli ambassador visits Nova Scotia

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — After a weekend visit to Halifax and Sydney, N.S., last month, Israel's ambassador to Canada Alan Baker said he left the Atlantic region more enlightened and avidly enthusiastic about small Jewish communities in Canada.

"I was so impressed with the way the Jewish communities have integrated with, and contributed to, the general communities," Baker said.

The British-born ambassador, nine months into his term, spoke at Halifax's two synagogue congregations on Friday evening and Saturday morning, respectively. He also met with Halifax Mayor Peter Kelly and Sue Moxley, the Anglican Bishop of Nova Scotia, and the editorial board of the Halifax Chronicle Herald.

In addition, Baker visited a Zim Line container ship in Halifax Harbour, toured Pier 21 – the immigration point for more than one million Canadians between 1921 and 1973 – and had Shabbat dinner at the home of Nova Scotia's Jewish lieutenant governor Myra Freeman.

In Sydney, Baker appeared at a community gathering of Jews and non-Jews before returning to Ottawa.

"Wherever I've gone, I've been impressed with the warmth of the Jewish community," he said. "There is a keenness to play a role, not just introspectively. This is a wonderful example of how a Jewish community outside Israel is appreciated by others and happy with itself."

He continued. "It's just sad that the younger generation moves away, something that is even more marked in Sydney than in Halifax. That creates a general concern about the future of small Jewish communities."

Baker was very impressed that he could have Shabbat dinner at Government House. "To light Shabbat candles there was meaningful," he said. "Dalia [Baker's wife] was crying with joy when she lit the candles with the lieutenant governor."

He said that after making kiddush, eating a kosher meal and benching, the offering of toasts was moving.

"The lieutenant Governor toasted Israel and asked me to toast the Queen of Canada, whom she represents. It's the first time I ever did that. I was born in England and this was very special to me. It was an evening neither Dalia nor I will ever forget."

His meetings with Kelly and Bishop Moxley were productive, he said.

He and the mayor discussed the need for outreach between the growing Islamic population and the Jewish community to create better understanding and alleviate future problems.

"I also indicated twin city arrangements might be available between Halifax and Haifa or other Israeli ports," Baker said. "I promised to set up a visit by Israeli port city mayors to Halifax and try to arrange a similar visit for Mr. Kelly to Israel."

Baker's visit to the Zim Line ship showed him the predominance of Zim containers in the Halifax rail yards. "The link between Halifax and Israel, through Zim Lines, is considerable."

At Pier 21, Baker heard taped interviews with immigrants speaking about their arrival in Canada, "a land of milk and honey."

With a laugh, he said, "I thought Israel was the land of milk and honey."

But he added that he would look into having the Israeli Embassy add a plaque to the other embassy plaques now on display at Pier 21.

"This museum, and [Halifax resident] Ruth Goldbloom's role in it [as founder of the Pier 21 Society and as its first board chair] is just another example of the Jewish community being active in the general community."

He said the enthusiasm in, and cohesiveness of, the Halifax Jewish community is remarkable compared to larger centres such as Toronto and Montreal, where so much is available to people.

"In the large communities, you can take it or leave it," Baker said, referring to Jewish living. "Here, everyone is part of it. Everyone is involved and committed."

It was thrilling to meet people who are so supportive of Israel, Baker said.

"I think it is important for them to have access to the Israeli ambassador, too."

Squaring the Hamas circle

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Elements of the media continue to be preoccupied with the implications of Hamas' increasing involvement in the Palestinian political process.

According to some analysts, Hamas could gain between 30 to 40 per cent of the seats in the Palestinian Legislative Council and effectively stop Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas from reaching a negotiated settlement with Israel, assuming it is even achievable.

On May 31, Reuters reported from Gaza about ongoing friction between Abbas' Fatah party and Hamas. Abbas has decided to re-run a number of municipal elections that Hamas won but are being contested because of alleged voting irregularities that benefited Hamas.

While Abbas wants Hamas "to enter mainstream politics in hopes of solidifying a tenuous ceasefire with Israel and broadening support for Middle East peace talks," Reuters reported that a "conflict with Hamas could undermine Abbas' quest for peace with Israel. Hamas, sworn to destroying the Jewish state, is observing a ceasefire engineered by Abbas. But the deal hinged partly on his promise of more power-sharing via elections."

Reuters unwittingly conveys the contradictions in Abbas' attempt to co-opt an organization sworn to defeating what he has declared he is working toward: peace with Israel.

The contradictions are apparent in the essay "The Lost Palestinians," by Hussein Agha and Robert Malley, published in the June 9 issue of the New York Review of Books.

On the one hand, they acknowledge that Hamas is dedicated to establishing an Islamic state "from the Jordan River to the [Mediterranean] sea." On the other, Agha and Malley argue, Hamas is prepared to accept Israel within the 1967 borders "in return for a decades-long truce or hudna, which would regulate… coexistence while their historic conflict endures."

As well, they write, by joining the political process, Hamas "can give [Abbas] a chance without giving the Oslo accords [i.e. a negotiated two-state solution] approval."

This may sound appealing, but just how this tension can be sustained over an extended period is not explained.

To be sure, Agha and Malley recognize that "Israelis and Americans [fear] the impact of a strong Islamist presence and [are] convinced that [Abbas] cannot succeed without eventually clashing with Hamas." They even note that there are people within Fatah who fear an Islamist takeover of the PA. Yet, they argue, Abbas is hoping that Hamas' involvement in the political process will change the organization and make it less militant and more pragmatic, accountable and politically responsible.

Agha and Malley even concede that "Hamas will likely be an active ally [to Abbas] when it comes to the politics of institutional reform and transparency [but] it will also be a constant irritant when it comes to the politics of peace."

After all, one of Hamas' objectives is to split Fatah, which is already weakened by divisions between unreconstructed, "Arafatists" and locals opposed to the Tunisian leadership that former PA president Yasser Arafat represented. (Even though Abbas was part of this leadership, he departed from it – with the possible exception of final status issues – and has led the forces opposed to Arafat's corrupt style of rule.)

Agha and Malley correctly note that Hamas is fundamentally an opposition party. "Hamas is attuned to opposition politics, not to political accountability," they write. Yet the core inconsistency in the Agha-Malley analysis is their conclusion that, from Abbas' perspective, "if Hamas is going to remain the opposition, it will be better to bring it inside Palestinian institutions than to leave it out" in the hope the group will reform.

What they fail to explain is the basis for their belief. Also unexplained is how Hamas can run as a national party on a municipal agenda (providing local social services) while shirking responsibilities on an international level for any diplomatic fallout as it opposes peace.

These bewildering attempts to try to reconcile contradictions, and even to leave some raw on the page, are what characterize so much of the reporting about Hamas' possible involvement in the political process.

The media's task is to recognize those contradictions and not allow them to pass uncritically.

'It's just as important that we provide hope [to Israel]…'

Martin would not be pinned down on whether he regards the area surrounding Jerusalem now populated by Jews as illegal as well or whether Israel must in a permanent solution withdraw to the pre-1967 war borders or the 1948-49 armistice line, the so-called Green Line.

He said these are issues that should be left to negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, and that the role of Canada – and the United States – is to support those negotiations. "I'm not going to anticipate the way in which those negotiations unfold."

Martin reaffirmed Canada's support of the 2003 internationally backed "road map" peace plan, which foresees a phased-in process toward a permanent and comprehensive settlement. He stressed the necessity of both sides adhering to what they agreed upon. "It's important to allow [Abbas and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and their respective governments] to work along the lines of the 'road map,' which sets out a series of confidence-building steps. We should not go faster than they want to go." Reaching each of those steps is an important objective in itself, he added.

Martin said Canada plans to play a greater role in the Middle East. He said he will visit the region at an "appropriate time."

"Canada can play a greater role in the Middle East. There's a call that we do so and I intend to respond."

What form that takes is up to what the Palestinians and Israelis ask of Canada. Having heard specific requests from Abbas, he indicated the ball is now in Sharon's court.

"I am looking for Prime Minister Sharon to say to me what he wants Canada to do," he said.

Martin said he often speaks to Sharon by phone and has invited him to Canada "but he has a lot on his plate, and we are looking for a convenient time."

Martin said he understands that Israel's economy has suffered in recent years and Canada might be able to help in some way.

"It's just as important that we provide hope [to Israel]… Whatever we do, there is no doubt that Israel has the moral support of Canada."

In fact, Martin reiterated several times during the half-hour interview Canada's "unequivocal support for the Jewish State of Israel. This is not lip service. It is absolutely real" and consistent with its support for a "viable" Palestinian state.

"This is the principle that we have established, that we operate under and pursue."

As for criticism from the Jewish community that Canada abstains too often on resolutions denouncing Israel at the United Nations and its agencies, Martin said: "What's happening is that there is almost a serial of resolutions. All these resolutions have to be taken on a case-by-case basis. Canada does deal with each individually. We have got to be fair."

On the issue of the claims by Jewish refugees from Arab lands, Martin appeared to be informed and sensitive.

He is aware that between 750,000 and 850,000 Jews fled Arab or Muslim countries, and noted that one of his ministers, Tunisian-born Jacques Saada, is one of them. He said he has spoken to others over the years, and has heard of their loss of property and "historic connections."

"A refugee is a refugee. I think we've got to be prepared [to take Jewish claims] into consideration," he said. However, he hinted that the circumstances of today's refugees still living in camps may have to take priority.

Without any questioning, Martin raised the issue of anti-Semitism in the world, which he described as becoming "virulent," and in Canada where it is a "phobia."

"Government has to combat anti-Semitism in whatever form it takes… The role of the Canadian government is to make very clear that it cannot be allowed to take root. It's just that simple."

OSCE continues effort to deal with anti-Semitism

By RON KAMPEAS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Standardizing the way anti-Semitism is monitored in Europe, improving Holocaust education and combating anti-Jewish bigotry in media coverage of Israel are the priorities of a top official of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE).

In a quick visit to the United States last week, Gert Weisskirchen met with Jewish leaders to reassure them that he is serious in his efforts to fulfil the goals set by the 55-member OSCE at its anti-Semitism conferences in the past two years.

Weisskirchen, who also is the foreign policy spokesperson for the ruling Social Democrats in the German Bundestag, told JTA his immediate priority is to standardize drastically uneven monitoring of anti-Semitism across Europe.

"We should have a better system of collecting data – what is really happening, what kind of violence is going on on the ground," he said.

He hopes a system under development at the OSCE's human rights arm, based in Warsaw, will be adopted across the continent.

"Some countries are better than others," Weisskirchen said. "Governments are collecting different kinds of data. We are working on criteria, what kind of data should be collected."

Weisskirchen's leadership post, which he assumed in January, was mandated at last year's OSCE conference on anti-Semitism in Berlin. The organization also established positions to combat Islamophobia and racism in Europe.

Jewish leaders scheduled to attend this year's OSCE anti-Semitism conference in Cordoba, Spain, June 8 and 9, are frustrated with the slowness of reforms discussed at the first such conference, held in Vienna in 2003.

Weisskirchen helped reassure them that changes are under way.

"He's very dedicated; he's an excellent choice for the post," said Betty Ehrenberg, director of international affairs for the Orthodox Union. "I hope he gets support."

Weisskirchen is well known to Jewish leaders who have sought greater sensitivity in Europe to the resurgence in anti-Semitism there. In his nearly 30 years representing a southern German district in the Bundestag, Weisskirchen has stood out as a legislator who is particularly sensitive to the issue, Jewish officials say.

At a German Embassy event last month marking the new Holocaust memorial in Berlin, Weisskirchen, who was born in 1944, spoke sensitively of his legacy as a child of parents of the Nazi generation.

"The cold-blooded perpetrators, their telling silence was to be broken by the resolve of the next generation," he said.

When one Germanophile at the event asked Weisskirchen whether Germany now was ready to commemorate in a similar fashion the postwar, mass deportation of ethnic Germans from Czechoslovakia, Weisskirchen rejected the comparison.

His wife was deported as an infant from Sudetenland, he said, but a tragedy Germans brought upon themselves could never be equal to the greater tragedy they brought upon the Jews.

Weisskirchen has met twice since January with his counterparts dealing with racism and Islamophobia, and has consulted with leading European academics.

Appalled by the lack of knowledge of the Holocaust in Europe, he is examining education programs that he hopes can be introduced in schools across the continent through teacher-training programs. One such program is being developed in Moscow, he said.

"You see an unbelievable lack of information," he said. "We need to give new forms of curriculum to the teachers, not only to be better informed but to be better prepared to give the students an image of what happened in the 1940s in Europe, a better understanding of what happened."

Another focus, he said, is the way the media reports the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. No government or pan-governmental body should impose standards, he said, but journalists should be encouraged to introduce such standards in their own reporting.

Differences discussed at meeting of European Jews

By JACQUES WEILL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BASEL, Switzerland — European Jewish organizations have to improve their lobbying abilities in order to be more successful in the European political environment and the wider Jewish world, where Israel and the United States are the dominant forces.

This was the conclusion of many of the 207 delegates to a gathering last weekend of top officials of the European Council of Jewish Communities.

Participants from more than 37 countries, representing 72 cities and 86 organizations, came to Basel, which hosted the First Zionist Congress in 1897.

During the three-day conference, it was clear that there are many divisions among Europe's estimated three million Jews. Religiously, there are Orthodox, Conservative and liberal denominations.

Communally, western European groups tend to have more experience – and greater financial resources – than the communities of eastern Europe, which are supported largely by overseas organizations such as the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

Politically, there are differences among old members of the European Union, the 10 new members who joined last year and non-members.

The divisions became evident in sessions at the conference, where even the title of one spoke volumes: "A Single European Jewish Voice Is a Fantasy That Can Never Be Achieved."

At another session, "Governmental Relations and Lobbying," Emil Kalo, president of the Bulgarian Jewish communities, took issue with a remark by a Spanish participant in the audience, who wanted to teach Kalo about lobbying in eastern Europe.

Kalo himself caused a controversy by claiming that Jews were the best lobbyists. "If we were so successful, why do we always have to talk about rising anti-Semitism?" someone responded.

The panel concluded that European Jews have a lot to learn from American organizations such as the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

Roman Rosenstein from Zurich, a representative of the Anti-Defamation League, said that while many Jewish organizational representatives were impressed by nice hotels and their political counterparts, the important thing before meeting ministers and other high-ranking politicians is to be prepared and know what to press for in a meeting.

Problems also can arise when different Jewish groups are lobbying for different positions.

For instance, Irith Raub-Michelsohn, executive director of the Union of Progressive Jews in Germany, is negotiating with the German government about permitting more Russian Jews to immigrate to Germany. While the Union of Progressive Jews is in favour of letting all people with one Jewish parent into the country, the larger Central Council of Jews in Germany prefers to let in only those with a Jewish mother, in accordance with the traditional Jewish position of matrilineal descent.

"This kind of division we definitely should avoid," Raub-Michelsohn told JTA.

Daniel Rothschild, treasurer of the Swiss Federations of Jewish Communities, said his community will "need good lobbying" when it faces an upcoming political fight over the import of kosher meat.

Since ritual slaughtering is not allowed in Switzerland, kosher meat is imported. Now animal rights activists have started an effort to ban the import of kosher meat.

Rothschild said that the meeting, which brought together Jews from across the continent, was uplifting for Switzerland's 17,000 Jews.

Other participants also said the most interesting part of the meeting was the opportunity to discuss with colleagues from other communities issues such as Jewish education.

Jonathan Joseph, the president of European Council, said that despite the differences among European Jews, a meeting such as this shows the ability to discuss openly "issues that are of great concern for the Jewish communities."

Joseph, who is from London, stressed that the Jewish communities have to live in harmony with their environment.

He said that the European Council, which was founded almost 40 years ago, should be a forum for all different Jewish movements.

The next meeting of council officials is slated to take place in 2006 in Berlin.

Second summit seen

Ariel Sharon and Mahmoud Abbas will meet June 21. Aides to the Israeli prime minister and Palestinian Authority president announced the planned summit, the first since they met in the Egyptian resort of Sharm el-Sheik and agreed to a ceasefire in February. There was no word on the venue for the new meeting.

Double bombing foiled

Israeli security forces said they foiled a double suicide bombing planned for Jerusalem. The Shin Bet, police and army special forces arrested five Islamic Jihad terrorists who had packed two suitcases with explosives and detonators. The bombs were for a double suicide attack in the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Ramot. Israeli officials believe Islamic Jihad seeks to disrupt the de facto truce observed by most terror groups in the West Bank and Gaza since March at the behest of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Dollars for withdrawal

Israel will pay evacuated settlers an average of $450,000 per family in compensation, the government said last week. Some 8,500 settlers are to be relocated when Israel withdraws from Gaza and northern West Bank starting in mid-August. Their compensation packages will be based on criteria such as family size and how long they've lived in their homes. Some settlers have petitioned against the withdrawal at Israel's High Court of Justice, calling the relocation terms inadequate.

Israel frees prisoners

Israel released 398 Palestinian prisoners. The prisoners, most of them convicted of attacks that did not cause major casualties, were bussed out of Ketziot jail in southern Israel to various checkpoints in the West Bank and Gaza last Thursday. The move marked the completion of the goodwill release of 900 prisoners that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon undertook as part of his ceasefire declaration with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in February. The original roster for last week's release included 400 prisoners, but two declined to be freed. One said he wanted to stay with his jailed brother, and another wanted to complete Israeli-sponsored matriculation studies behind bars.

Abbas has angioplasty

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to wish him well after Abbas underwent an angioplasty late last week. Abbas is known to suffer from eye, heart and other medical problems. The PA president said he plans to appoint a deputy and will bring the matter to the National Assembly.

Germany battles Muslim extremism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BERLIN — The chilling possibility that Muslim terrorists and neo-Nazis may combine forces was raised as a distinct possibility by Israel's president last week.

On a visit to commemorate the 40th anniversary of diplomatic relations between Israel and Germany, Moshe Katsav declared, "Let us not be surprised if one day terror organizations use neo-Nazis to carry out terrorist attacks."

The majority of Muslims in Europe are law-abiding citizens, he added. But Muslim extremists may form alliances with neo-Nazis, he suggested.

Katsav's fears are not misplaced.

The mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States, Mohammed Atta, lived and studied in Hamburg, a major port in northern Germany.

Twenty-five thousand to 30,000 Muslims in Germany are members of radical Islamic organizations, according to ministry of interior spokesperson Georgios Tsapanos.

Micha Brumlik, the director of the Fritz Bauer Institut in Frankfurt, a body that studies the impact of the Holocaust on German society, said there are 3,000 to 4,000 hard-core Muslim militants in Germany, much fewer than in France.

Since Sept. 11, 2001, the German government has banned five extremist Muslim organizations and newspapers, introduced tighter controls over Islamic groups, placed certain individuals under surveillance, raided mosques in search of inflammatory videos and leaflets, banned an Islamic conference there set to discuss "Zionist terrorism," begun monitoring Islamic schools and set up a central database on suspected Islamic radicals.

Of late, Muslim extremists in Germany have targeted Jews.

Three years ago, an Arab man attacked a synagogue in Dusseldorf with a Molotov cocktail.

Since 2004, Djamel Mustafa, a 31-year-old Algerian, has been on trial in Dusseldorf for his role in an alleged plot to attack Jewish targets, including the renowned Jewish Museum. Arrested in April 2002; he was accused of belonging to Al Tawhid, a radical Palaestinian network.

Last May, Ishan Garnaoui, a 33-year-old Tunisian, went on trial in Berlin, charged with organizing and training a team of Muslims to carry out bombings against Jewish and American facilities in Germany.

Three years ago, the ministry of interior, headed by Otto Schily, uncovered evidence suggesting that an explosion that killed 17 people, including 12 German tourists, at a Tunisian synagogue was partly planned by Muslims in Germany linked to Al Qaeda.

Al Qaeda suspects have figured prominently in several trials in Germany.

In April 2004, Mounir el-Motassadeq – the only person convicted in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Centre in Manhattan and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C. – was released after a lengthy trial.

A former Moroccan engineering student, he was accused of 3,066 counts of accessory to murder, maintaining an association with the Sept. 11 hijackers and knowingly helping them stage the attacks. He was released after it was determined he had been denied a fair trial.

In February 2004, Abdelghani Mzoudi, Atta's former roommate and another Moroccan accused of providing support to the Sept. 11 hijackers, was acquitted after the United States refused to allow testimony from a suspected Al Qaeda operative in its custody.

Last January, German police arrested two suspected Al Qaeda members allegedly planning a suicide attack in Iraq.

Several months before, police arrested Mamoun Darkazanli, a German businessman of Syrian origin suspected of being a key Al Qaeda financier.

Spanish police believe he provided Al Qaeda with logistical help in last year's train bombings in Madrid in which scores of commuters were killed.

Carl Heinrich von Bauer, deputy head of the North Rhine-Westphalia state police, recently claimed that most Al Qaeda cells in Germany have been smashed. But Germany, having dispatched peacekeeping troops to Afgahnistan, remains on Al Qaeda's hit list.

Long before Katsav warned that Muslim extremists and neo-Nazis may link up in a marriage of convenience, Schily banned Hizb ut-Tahir, or Party of Liberation, which had ties with the neo-Nazi National Democratic Party.

Hizb ut-Tahir, an organization with acolytes in many European countries, wants to unite the Muslim world in a single theocratic state under a caliph, or supreme Muslim leader.

Schily banned the group in 2002 after accusing it of "spreading violent propaganda and anti-Jewish agitation" and after receiving reports its representatives had met with members of the National Democratic Party in 2001.

In his latest strike on Muslim radicalism, taken this past April, Schily closed a Turkish newspaper, Anadoluda Vakit, which had published anti-Semitic and anti-Western material. Prior to this, he banned Yeni Akit GmbH, a publishing house that had printed Anadoluda Vakit's European edition.

The newspaper, with a circulation of 10,000 in Germany and 60,000 in Turkey, was closed after a German parliamentarian told the Bundestag that it had denied the Holocaust, a criminal offence in Germany.

"The truth is there was no Holocaust," a column in the newspaper claimed. "The so-called gas chambers are a lie as well. All this is nothing but Zionist music."

Schily is now considering a ban on activities by Hezbollah members in Germany.

Last year, the Federal Administrative Court in Leipzig upheld a government ban on Al-Aqsa, which collected money for Hamas. Last month, Germany announced it may expel a Jordanian accused of raising funds for Al-Aqsa.

Three million or more Muslims live in Germany, comprising about four per cent of its population.

The majority are Turks, said Tsapanos, the son of a Greek guest worker who stayed on in Germany. In addition to Turks, Germany is home to Bosnian, Indian, North African and Palestinian Muslims.

There is also a community of 100,000 ethnic German converts to Islam. One of them, Steven Smyrek, was arrested and imprisoned in Israel some years ago on charges of being a Hezbollah agent. He was released in 2004 in an Israel-Hezbollah prisoner swap, and now lives in Germany as a free man.

In an attempt to contain Muslim extremism, Tsapanos said, the government is closely monitoring Muslim schools where radical Islam has been taught.

And in the battle for the minds of young Muslim students attending regular state schools, the ministry of education has introduced Islamic lessons into the curriculum, he disclosed.

Israel faces terror war after pullout, Ya'alon warns

By ARI SHAVIT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.'

TEL AVIV — Moshe Ya'alon, leaving the post of army chief last week after three years, warned in an interview with Ha'aretz that unless Israel commits to further withdrawals after this summer's disengagement from Gaza, the pullout will be followed by an outbreak of renewed violence.

Prior to handing his position to successor Dan Halutz, Ya'alon also said in the interview that the establishment of a Palestinian state would lead to war at some stage.

In a ceremony at the Prime Minister's Office marking the transition, Ya'alon said Israel's military efforts brought the Palestinians to cease their campaign of terrorism, at least for the present.

In a widely criticized move earlier this year, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz departed from past practice and refused to extend Ya'alon's three-year term by another year.

Mofaz was conspicuously absent from the long list of people that Ya'alon thanked during the ceremony.

The tension between the two also led Mofaz to say in a later speech, "The fact that we did not always see eye to eye took nothing away from the high esteem in which I hold you in your loyal service and your contribution to the state."

"I was given the trust and the privilege to command the [Israel Defence Forces] during three years of some of the most difficult, complex, and fateful combat since the War of Independence. In this fighting, the IDF and the security forces scored many unprecedented achievements," Ya'alon told the ceremony.

"There is no doubt in my heart that the military achievements were what brought our enemy to the awareness, for the moment, that terrorism doesn't pay."

In the interview, published before the ceremony, Ya'alon said, "If there is an Israeli commitment to another move, we will gain another period of quiet."

"If not, there will be an eruption… Terrorist attacks of all types: shooting, bombs, suicide bombers, mortars, Qassam rockets." Without an additional withdrawal, "there is a high probability of a second war of terror," which will begin in the West Bank, he said.

Asked whether Ya'alon intended to say that following the disengagement, Kfar Sava's location near the West Bank will leave it in the same situation as the Negev town of Sderot, which is regularly targeted by Qassam rockets fired from nearby Gaza, Ya'alon responded: "And Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, too. There will be suicide bombings wherever they can perpetrate them."

Following Ya'alon's speech at the Prime Minister's Office, Halutz declared, "We must not drag the IDF into the public debate that accompanies the disengagement plan."

"Division and refusal will not be accepted, whatever their reasons."

But Halutz later indicated that the statement was not intended to be a swipe at statements by Ya'alon that have been interpreted as political in content.

In the interview, Ya'alon said recent statements by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas show that Abbas "has not given up the right of return. And this is not a symbolic right of return, but the right of return as a claim to be realized. To return to the houses, to return to the villages. The implication of this is that there will not be a Jewish state here."

Therefore, he said, the establishment of a Palestinian state will lead to war "at some stage," and such a war could be dangerous for Israel. The idea that a Palestinian state can be established by 2008 and will then produce stability, is "divorced from reality" and "dangerous," as any such state "will be a state that will try to undermine Israel," Ya'alon said.

Asked about the current situation in the PA, Ya'alon responded: "For the Palestinians, it is still convenient to maintain a gang-based reality rather than a state foundation.

"When [the PA] permits Hamas to take part in the elections without abandoning its firearms, is that democracy? It's gangs. Armed gangs playing at pretend democracy," he said.

"If Fatah continues to behave as it does now, Hamas will eventually take over the Gaza Strip."

Regarding the IDF's plans for implementing the disengagement from Gaza, Ya'alon said that the army is preparing for the possibility of entering Khan Yunis "if there is shooting from there" during the withdrawal.

The disengagement, he continued, will not create a "situation of stability." Therefore, "I do not rule out" the possibility that the army will return to Gaza at some point.

Ya'alon said it's impossible to know how long the disengagement will take.

"The question is whether we evacuate 8,000 residents or 20,000 Israeli citizens or maybe 50,000. If you evacuate 8,000, it could last three weeks. If you have to evacuate more, it could take longer."

In other words, he said, it's too soon to talk about the withdrawal as a fait accompli. "If and when we complete the move, we will talk about a fait accompli."

Asked for his views on the general concept of two states for two peoples, he said: "In the present reality, I see difficulty in producing a stable situation of end-of-conflict within that paradigm."

A two-state solution, he continued, is simply "not relevant. It is a story that the Western world tells with Western eyes. And that story does not comprehend the scale of the gap and the scale of the problem. We, too, are sweeping it under the carpet."

Asked whether he fears for Israel's existence, Ya'alon responded: "A combination of terrorism and demography, with question marks among us about the rightness of our way, are a recipe for a situation in which there will not be a Jewish state here in the end."

Outgoing Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon says his farewells to his IDF colleagues last week. [Israel Sun photos]

Reluctant U.S. showing signs of shift on Hamas

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The U.S. government is showing signs of easing its hard-line approach toward Hamas, in response to the militant group's increasing political clout in the Palestinian territories and appeals for flexibility from European allies, U.S. officials and diplomats say.

The White House agreed to have Hamas run candidates in Palestinian elections, even though the group has refused to disarm and Washington lists it as a major terrorist organization.

In contrast to past calls for the total dismantling of Hamas, U.S. officials say they may be open to contacts with some Hamas political affiliates and have left open the possibility of dealing with the group if it gives up weapons and ends violence.

U.S. representatives cast any shift as pragmatic: Hamas-funded social services are popular with many Palestinians. It is winning local races and was expected to make a strong showing in newly postponed parliamentary elections, and some Hamas-backed politicians and affiliates are seen as moderates.

The shift also follows a behind-the-scenes push by European allies, including Britain and France, to have Washington drop its call to dismantle Hamas completely. European officials warned Washington that doing so would be a "disaster" for Palestinians who benefit from Hamas aid, sources say.

"There is now a realization that they [Hamas] do have a role to play… that if you can bring them into the political fold, then you'll be marginalizing the military elements of those groups," a European diplomat said.

Still, White House spokesperson Scott McClellan said President George W. Bush has not changed his view of Hamas as a terrorist group that must be disarmed.

"We have great confidence in democracy and elections," McClellan said. "When people are given the chance to express themselves, they tend to choose those who seek peace and those who seek to improve their quality of life, not terrorists."

A senior administration official said, "We're not acquiescing. We do not deal with… terrorists." But he added, "How do you pursue this without limiting democratic choices?"

Another senior official called it a shift in emphasis, not policy, and it could be reversed if Hamas-sponsored violence escalates.

Trans-Atlantic discussions are expected to continue this week with visits by British and German officials. British Prime Minister Tony Blair will meet with Bush on Tuesday.

European diplomats said a strong election showing by Hamas and a cease-fire deal could prompt the European Union to reconsider its decision to put Hamas on its terrorist blacklist, as it did in 2003 after heavy lobbying by the United States and Israel.

American officials acknowledge that Hamas' electoral rise poses a dilemma in defining "terrorists," and deciding what to do about millions of dollars in U.S. aid for projects in towns run by elected officials from Hamas or affiliates.

"It's a very complicated problem. What do you do about these groups when they are both terrorist groups and entering into politics?" the senior administration official said.

Increased flexibility might put the Bush administration at odds with Israel Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Though officials insist there is no change in the U.S. policy not to make a distinction – as Europe does – between Hamas' political and military operations, the administration may be moving in that direction, diplomats and experts say.

While asserting that the United States will not deal directly with Hamas "terrorists," a senior Bush administration official said it may be willing to have contact with politicians "affiliated with the group."

There is "a big difference" between people who "may be members of organizations but are not terrorists, versus terrorists, people who have blood on their hands," McClellan said in March.

After meeting with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, Bush did not publicly repeat demands for the PA to dismantle militant groups, although aides said his position was unchanged.

Supporters of engagement said it fits with Bush's call for spreading democracy. But critics said Hamas' political role should be curbed until it disarms and renounces terrorism.

Abbas' announcement that he is postponing July 17 legislative elections could buy time for Washington to clarify its Hamas policy. No new date has been set for the vote.

Israel ties Ireland in World Cup match

CJN news services

Israel maintained its unbeaten streak in World Cup qualification play, earning a 2-2 draw against Ireland in Dublin last weekend.

With two wins and five draws in seven games, Israel had 11 points and was in second place in European Group 4, one point behind the leader, Switzerland.

The draw shocked the Irish, who lamented lost scoring opportunities and Israel's "play-acting, time-wasting and cheating," according to the Daily Telegraph.

Search for 'lost' Jews leads to Spain, Brazil and India

By ELI STUTZ
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV – How many Jews are there in the world? Demographers estimate the number to be just above the 13-million mark.

But Michael Freund thinks there may be a lot more. Freund, once an adviser to former Israeli prime minister Binyamin Netanyahu, has now taken on a different role, that of a globetrotting Jew hunter.

Two Bnei Menashe children

Who is Freund looking for, exactly? Jewish history is replete with stories of exile and dispersion. From the 10 tribes banished by Sennacherib to the Spanish Inquisition, Jews have been chased and harried to the four corners of the earth. While many Jews retained their Judaism throughout the long course of their exile, some Jewish communities were lost along the way to persecution, forced conversion and voluntary assimilation. Or were they?

The last 50 years have seen the discovery of groups around the world whose customs resemble Jewish customs or who have a tradition that indicates they were once part of the Jewish people. It is these people that Freund seeks. He believes that many of them really are Jews and that they should be given the opportunity to rejoin their Jewish brethren. The organization that he heads, Shavei Israel (meaning Returnees to Israel) is dedicated to this effort.

Freund's recent travels have taken him to some far-flung locales. He's just returned to Israel from running a seminar for Marranos in the northern Portuguese city of Porto. The Marranos, also called "Bnei Anusim," are those whose ancestors were forcibly converted to Catholicism during the Spanish Inquisition but continued to practise their Judaism in secret.

"Even though they've been raised as Catholics," says Freund, "many of these people have retained Jewish practices, such as lighting candles on Friday evening. What's remarkable is that this is still done in a covert fashion." Freund believes this covertness could either be a mimicking of their forefather's necessary secrecy or it could be that even today, these people fear being identified as Jews to their sometimes anti-Semitic neighbours.

Last September, Israel's Sephardi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Amar visited two Bnei Anusim communities in Portugal. Freund says this visit was a landmark. "We accompanied him and arranged for him to meet these people. He was very moved by the experience. He now wants to establish a committee within the rabbinate to examine the halachic issues surrounding the B'nei Anusim, with the hope of finding a solution that will enable them to return to the Jewish people."

After visiting the Marranos in Europe, Freund went to the northeastern Brazilian town of Recife. A town on the water, Recife was the place that many of the Bnei Anusim ended up as they fled Spain and Portugal, looking for a freer life. "Many serious historians believe there are several million of them living there today," says Freund, who met with dozens. "These people want to rejoin the Jewish people."

Next on Freund's itinerary – a visit to the "Bnei Menashe" in northeastern India. Bnei Menashe, meaning sons of Menashe (one of the 10 lost tribes), live in the northeastern Indian states of Mizoram and Manipur, on the borders with Burma and Bangladesh. "There are about 6,000 to 7,000 Bnei Menashe there now, living religious Jewish lives," says Freund. "Eight hundred made aliyah over the past decade."

At the end of March, Rabbi Amar decided to formally recognize the Bnei Menashe as being "Zera Yisrael" (the Seed of Israel) – meaning descendants of the Jewish people. "This decision is a historic development that will open the door to aliyah for the remaining members of the community," says Freund.

Freund is soon off to lay the groundwork of the rabbinical court that will carry out the conversion of the Bnei Menashe. "We have two educational centres in northeastern India where we prepare them for conversion. So we need to build mikvaot and we need to send additional teachers and rabbis to facilitate the process."

"If you look at the awakening that's taking place across the globe, it's hard to explain it in rational terms," says Freund. "Why are these people coming out of the woodwork and demanding to join the Jewish people after centuries of silence?

Michael Freund dances with Bnei Menashe.

"I suggest there's something mystical that's going on here, something of some tremendous historical and theological significance. We're beginning to see the fruition of what the prophets foretold, that those who were lost to Judaism will find their way back."

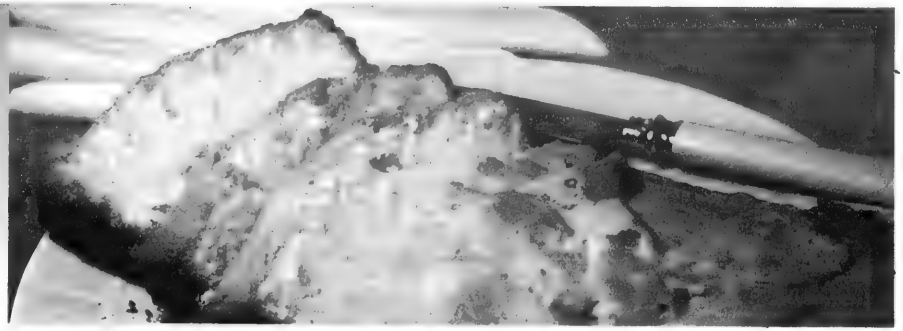
Divine cream cheese pound cake



By LISA SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

My sister Wendy gives parties. Small ones for her family of five, large ones for her international mix of friends, in her kitchen buffet style, around her swimming pool with fajitas and margaritas, or grilling marinated chicken and hot dogs at her neighbourhood clubhouse. So when I fly in from Texas to visit her and the rest of my large family in Atlanta, I often walk in on a feast of leftovers crowding her counter space from parties past, and filling her refrigerator for parties future.

A few years ago, amidst rugelach from her mother-in-law, a cornucopia of unusual chips, huge brownies and other interesting treats, I saw a simple loaf cake wrapped nice and tight on the kitchen counter. My sister gladly parted with a thick portion, as she said she couldn't afford to keep eating it. With one taste, I understood. Whole, the cake had the nice browned crust of an old-fashioned pound cake. Sliced, the moist insides had the light, creamy colour of a rich butter cake. But the taste was fuller, rounder, more delectable (and yes, fattening) since it was made with a healthy portion of cream cheese. To me, the satisfying depth of the centre had no end.

When I asked my sister what party the cake was from, she said it wasn't. "My neighbour, Pat, makes a bunch of these and gives them to people, just because."

And just because of Pat, and the cheese in the ingredients, and the overwhelmingly giving taste, I think her Cream Cheese Pound Cake is the perfect Shavuot treat. Because one of the customs for celebrating Shavuot is the eating of dairy on the first day. The other is reading Torah, which according to The Jewish Holidays, A Guide and Commentary by Michael Strassfeld, not only celebrates God's gift of the Torah to the Jewish people, but reminds us that in the receiving, we were "experiencing the divine."

PAT'S CREAM CHEESE POUND CAKE

3 sticks butter (1½ cups), room temperature
1 8-oz. package cream cheese
3 cups sugar
1½ tsp. vanilla
dash of salt
6 large eggs
3 cups cake flour, sifted

Preheat oven to 325. Butter, or spray with vegetable spray, two 9 x 5x 3-inch loaf pans. Line with wax paper and butter paper as well.

In bowl of electric mixer with paddle attachment, cream butter, cream cheese and sugar until light and fluffy. Mix very well. Add salt and vanilla and mix. Add eggs, one a time, beating after each addition. Turning mixer to low speed, gradually add cake flour, mixing thoroughly and scraping sides as needed.

Transfer batter to prepared loaf pans and smooth with spatula. Bake for 1 hour 15 minutes to 1 hour and 30 minutes. Cakes are done when toothpick inserted into centre comes out clean and cakes begin to pull away from sides of pan.

Cool in pan on wire rack for 10 minutes. Then remove from pans and cool completely. Makes 2 loaves, each serving 12.

Synagogues support Zareinu's Moveathon

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Synagogues across the Greater Toronto Area are participating in the 2 km Clergy on the Move, part of Zareinu Educational Centre's eighth annual Moveathon, set for June 19 at Earl Bales Park.

The Moveathon, presented by RBC Capital Markets, is a full-day fundraiser that draws about 4,000 people each year. Activities include athletic events, a community picnic and a carnival.

Money raised will support Zareinu, a day school and treatment centre for children with physical and developmental disabilities.

David Brown, chair of Clergy on the Move, and a member of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, said that about 20 synagogues are participating in this year's event.

Led by their rabbis and/or cantors, synagogue members will assemble at about 1 p.m. and walk the 2 km route under their shul banner.

The synagogue that raises the most money will be treated to a kiddush by the school.

"We keep the walk at 2 km because we want everyone to participate, from small children to grandparents," said Brown.

"Toronto is lucky to have an institution like Zareinu, but it is very expensive to run a school with such intensive programming.

"We got involved in the Moveathon because Zareinu is a school that deserves our support," said Brown.

Isaac Osiel, Clergy on the Move's representative at Petah Tikva Congregation, said that when he was asked to get involved, he "jumped at the chance because it was an opportunity to shed light on an organization that exists for the benefit of the community."

For the past two years, he said, his synagogue finished on top in both money raised and attendance. "We started a buzz in the congregation because we wanted to create awareness for a cause that touches all of us."

Rabbi Yoseph Oziel, spiritual leader of Petah Tikva, said he is happy to see his congregation getting involved in something outside of its borders.

"I am supporting the event because community involvement is essential, and what more powerful organization [is there to support] than Zareinu?

"There is also great value in working toward one cause with other community organizations. To see the park filled with a variety of organizations is heartwarming. It is important for children to see that the community is unified," he said.

Other Moveathon events include 100 km and 5 km rides sponsored by Adenat; a 20 km family ride sponsored by Eli Monson Simpson; a 10 km run sponsored by O & Y properties; a meet and greet with SpongeBob SquarePants and Dora the Explorer; and entertainment by Mandell Entertainment.

For information call 416-661-1800 or visit www. moveathon.com.

June is Elder Abuse Awareness Month

The month of June has been proclaimed Elder Abuse Awareness Month in Toronto, along with some 50 other municipalities, including Markham and Vaughan.

The month was kicked off by a march last week from Hendon Avenue down Yonge Street to Mel Lastman Square.

The event sponsor was Toronto Residents in Partnership (TRIP), a not-for-profit group that promotes racial, ethnic, religious and communal understanding.

The first Elder Abuse Awareness Month was proclaimed three years ago by then-Toronto mayor Mel Lastman after TRIP decided to raise awareness about the lack of awareness by the general public of the financial, physical and emotional abuse suffered by some elderly, particularly since abuse tends to come from caregivers and many victims don't complain because they have nowhere else to go.

TRIP says it has a two-pronged approach to the issue.

"On one hand, we are trying to raise awareness and sensitivity, while at the same time making the government and bureaucrats aware that something must be done to protect our elderly from physical, mental, sexual and financial abuse, and neglect."

It's asking the government to create support groups and shelter homes.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Can soy and soy foods prevent breast cancer?

A. This is a hot topic, a question that many people believe is true. But, after reviewing the current available research, I do not believe it is possible to make such a statement. The evidence is weak and I would not recommend adding soy to your diet in the hope that it will have a preventive effect.

Q. I am seeing the ingredient Sucralose on a lot of packages. What is this?

A. Sucralose is a sugar substitute made from sugar. It is a low-calorie alternative, commonly used now, that can be used in baking and cooking. It is also called Splenda. To date, Sucralose is considered a safe sugar substitute.

Q. I am trying to improve the quality of the foods I eat, and I was wondering which foods are particularly high in antioxidants?

A. When it comes to antioxidants, some of the most nutrient-dense foods to try to incorporate into your diet are blueberries (particularly wild), kidney beans, cranberries, artichokes, blackberries, raspberries, prunes, strawberries, pecans, walnuts and cherries.

Q. Why does ground beef need to be cooked more well done than steak?

A. The most harmful bacteria on beef tend to be the outside. When a steak is cooked, the outside usually gets hot enough to kill the bacteria, but when you make ground beef, the meat from the outside gets mixed in with the meat inside where the temperature often does not get as hot. Make sure all ground beef reaches an internal temperature of 160 degrees Fahrenheit.

Preschool Education
The Vital Years

Like all children, preschoolers learn best in an enriched environment that contains a lot of sensory stimulation, and the skills children learn in their preschool years form the building blocks for future educational success and lifelong learning.

At The Toronto Heschel School, education begins with joyful learning and satisfaction of achievement, mastery and growth. This learning is a response to stimulating experiences and challenges.

"Our teachers make sure preschool children are ready for challenges that await them later on," says Gail Baker, the principal and head of The Toronto Heschel School. "For optimum learning to take place, children must be in a state of "relaxed alertness." This means that careful attention must be paid to the look and feel of the classroom.

"At The Toronto Heschel School, our preschool is structured, yet flexible. There is an ebb and flow to our day that ensures the developmental needs of this age group are met, and while there is a set curriculum in both general and Judaic studies, it allows for the curiosities and eagerness of each child in an integrated environment," Baker says.

"At Heschel, we achieve many of our goals through the Spectrum Approach", adds Tobie Franklin, head of the child studies team at The Toronto Heschel School. "This long-term collaborative research-based project was initiated by psychologist Howard Gardner and his researchers at the Harvard Graduate School of Education, together with psychologist David Henry Feldman at Tufts University."

In his theory of multiple intelligences, Gardner proposes that most people are capable of at least eight relatively autonomous forms of intellectual accomplishments. In other words, we learn in eight different ways; they are: linguistic, logical/mathematical, musical, spatial, bodily/kinesthetic, naturalist, interpersonal and intrapersonal intelligences.

Through Spectrum, children engage in activities that are meaningful and contextualized. For example, while playing the "Bus Game," children figure out the correct number of people boarding and leaving a bus.

In the Spectrum classroom, children are surrounded by rich and engaging materials in a wide variety of disciplines, thus evoking the use of a range of intelligences. In the discovery centre, for instance, a variety of biological specimens are brought in for students to examine and compare with other materials. This draws on the children's sensory and logical analytic abilities.

In the early years at The Toronto Heschel School, children are given ample opportunity to explore the various learning centres with their respective materials and "unique sets of elicited skills and intelligences" (Gardner and Krechevsky) and the students can become actively involved in helping to collect and document their work.

During all Spectrum activities, teachers engage in close observation of the children. Teachers also use activities or games devised by Project Spectrum researchers that permit a more precise determination of a child's strengths in different areas. This integrated programme also includes a rich tapestry of Judaic and Hebrew studies.

A new afternoon programme for four-year-olds includes classes in Hebrew through the arts, environmental science and the Spectrum Approach.

The preschool years are crucial to laying a firm foundation for future growth and academic success. You can give your child an excellent start at The Toronto Heschel School.

Berlin's Jewish Museum is both depressing and enlightening

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BERLIN — An average of 2,000 visitors file into the Jewish Museum every day to plumb the depths of 2,000 years of continuous Jewish history in Germany.

Opened almost four years ago, the zinc-panelled building, designed by the innovative architect Daniel Libeskind, is regarded as a major tourist draw and the biggest facility of its kind in Europe.

Charting the Jewish presence in Germany through thick and thin through 13 historical eras from Roman times to the contemporary period, the museum never loses sight of the Nazi interregnum that nearly wiped out one of the world's most venerable Jewish communities.

You'll need two to three hours for the tour, and the unusual architecture is bound to rivet your attention.

The Holocaust Tower, with its eerie vertical void, imparts isolation and hopelessness. The Garden of Exile, with its dizzying slanting floor, gives off a sense of uneasiness and disorientation.

The permanent displays are panoramic in scope.

You'll gaze upon a nearly pristine 13th-century Hebrew bible, a nasty 15th-century caricature of Jews, a 16th-century ordinance admitting Jewish merchants to the city of Augsburg and an 18th-century portrait of pre-eminent philosopher Moses Mendelssohn, one of the fathers of the Haskalah, the Jewish Enlightenment.

Strangely enough, there is a glaring omission. No permanent exhibit about the legendary Rothschilds, who launched their financial empire in Frankfurt, exists. Last year, however, the Rothschilds were featured in an important exhibition.

The exhibits about the 19th century – which ushered in the age of emancipation for German Jewry – range far and wide.

There is a map of rural Jewish communities and a portrait gallery of well-scrubbed middle-class families. There are also exhibits about Jewish converts to Christianity and Jewish-born revolutionaries such as Karl Marx and Ferdinand Lassalle.

The early 20th century, riven by the outbreak of World War I and the formation of the ill-fated Weimar Republic, is portrayed as a golden epoch for German Jews, as a series of panels show.

Rudolf Mosse was an important publisher. Max Reinhardt was a legendary theatre director. Kurt Weil was a celebrated composer. Martin Buber was a leading theologian. Walter Rathenau, gunned down by an anti-Semitic nationalist, was Germany's first and only Jewish foreign minister.

The patriotism of German Jews comes shining through in an exhibit on World War I. You may not know that some 12,000 Jewish soldiers were killed in action, a figure proportionately higher than the rest of the population.

Photographs, medals, letters, illustrations and German military prayer books, as well as a retrospective of a Jewish submariner, Max Haller, underscore the attachment of Jews to Germany.

But intimations of anti-Semitism in the ranks, as recorded by aggrieved soldier Hermann Abraham in his diary, suggest that Jewish love of country wasn't necessarily repaid.

The rise of virulent anti-Semitism, which coincided with Hitler's accession to power in 1933, is depicted through a collage of chilling photographs and flickering home movies.

We see Nazi stormtroopers humiliating Jews and indifferent or smiling German bystanders watching synagogues in Bielefeld and Buhl burn on Kristallnacht on Nov. 9, 1938.

Charts document the flight of Jews from 1933 onward. Jewish emigration levels topped the 20,000 mark annually until the flow was officially cut off on Oct. 23, 1941, in a prelude to the Holocaust.

Upward of 300,000 Jews managed to leave before the deluge, but 200,000 were deported and murdered. Twenty-five thousand Jews survived in concentration camps and mixed marriages and in hiding as fugitives.

The names of death camps and ghettos where German Jews were shipped, from Treblinka to Minsk, are inscribed on a white-washed wall on the lower level.

Several poignant photographic exhibits relate the stories of assimilated and converted Jews haplessly caught up in the Nazi net.

"The Naftalies" revolves around a Jewish family from the Berlin neighbourhood of Wedding who were deported to Lodz and then to Auschwitz.

"Charlotte Ochs' Life in Pictures" is about a woman who visited her sons in London and Cape Town in 1937 and returned to Berlin, only to be deported to Theresienstadt.

"The Cantor Family from Mainz" tells the story of a baptized Jewish couple who were married in a Protestant church in 1904, whose business was aryanized after Kristallnacht and who were deported to their deaths in the early 1940s.

"A Talented Musician" turns on Steffi Messerschmidt, a Berliner who fled to Belgium in 1937, who was arrested by the Nazis in 1942 and who was murdered in Auschwitz.

Documents from the Riga ghetto, to which some 16,000 German Jews were deported from 1941 to 1942, are a relentless chronicle of unalloyed despair.

A solitary menorah, given to a Berlin parish priest in 1968 by an elderly couple who got it from Jewish friends murdered in a concentration camp, encapsulates the enormity of the Holocaust in a single powerful object.

Amid the darkness, there are rays of light, signifying new beginnings for surviving Jews.

There is a certificate of naturalization, issued by the British authorities in Palestine on April 17, 1940, for Lothar Moritz Lion and his wife, Else.

There is the suitcase of Hedwig Roeder, who immigrated to France in 1939 and then on to Palestine.

There is a marriage certificate, in Mandarin, of a couple who found refuge in Shanghai, China, in the late 1930s, along with thousands of other European Jews.

There is a sombre portrait of Leo Baeck – the president of the Nazi-appointed National Union of Jews in Germany – who survived the rigours of Theresienstadt and settled in Britain after the war.

The end of World War II unfolds through stark photographs of death marches and the liberation of ragged survivors from concentration camps such as Bergen-Belsen.

The rebuilding of Jewish life in Germany during the post-war period is examined in several panels.

A panel on the sensational 1963 "Auschwitz trial" in Frankfurt, the subject of a documentary by the National Film Board of Canada, is representative of Germany's efforts to come to terms with its Nazi past.

All in all, a walk through the Jewish Museum is both an enlightening and depressing experience.

It is worth visiting if you care to understand the dynamics of Jewish German history.

Capacity crowd watches Bezmozgis win Jewish Book Award

The popular Montreal-based literary critic Robert Adams treated attendees to a rousing 20-minute guided tour of 20th-century North American Jewish literature. Adams received a standing ovation for his talk, one of the last he is slated to give before retiring this month from the lecture circuit.

"I think we've really come of age," said awards committee chairperson Miriam Webb. "We're now somewhat free of financial constraints and we had a star of the book world voluntarily be involved. It was like a dream come true, to get this donation and to be sanctioned by the likes of Robert Adams."

As they were summoned each in turn to the stage, recipients of the evening's 10 awards seemed equally exuberant about being there.

"You've made this historian's mother incandescent with happiness," quipped Warren Bass, who won the history prize for Support Any Friend, which traces the White House's attitude towards Israel and its positive shift during the Kennedy administration. The nachus generated by the award might even counterbalance the fact that he became "the wrong type of doctor," Bass joked.

Goldie Morgentaler won the translation prize for translating seven of her mother Chava Rosenfarb's Yiddish stories, published as the collection Survivors. Morgentaler praised the excellence of the stories and thanked the committee for recognizing that translation is an art as much as it is a craft. "Translation from Yiddish is really in this case a question of rescue," she said. Both Morgentaler and Rosenfarb traveled from Lethbridge to attend the event.

Isa Milman gave perhaps the most poetic expression of thanks to the committee for its recognition of Between the Doorposts, which won the Canadian Jewish News prize in poetry. "I heard a friend say, 'Writing and publishing a book of poetry is like throwing flower petals into the Grand Canyon and waiting for the echo to arise,'" she said.

York University Prof.Martin Lockshin took the prize for biblical-rabbinic scholarship for the fourth and final volume of his translation and commentary on Rashbam's Commentary on Deuteronomy. Lockshin paid homage to the medieval Jewish sage Rashbam "for writing a book that has fascinated me for 20 years.

"Amazingly, I haven't grown tired of him," Lockshin said. "One of the things he taught me is that the last word of interpretation of a text has not been written."

Other winners are Anne Dublin (children's literature) for Bobbie Rosenfeld, the Olympian Who Could Do Everything; Jill Culiner (Canadian Jewish history) for Finding Home; Elaine K. Naves (Holocaust memoir) for Shoshanna's Story; James Laxer (biography-memoir) for Red Diaper Baby; and Lisa Appignanesi (Holocaust literature) for The Memory Man.

A layered and poetical portrait of an artist

By MARTIN ZEILIG
Special to The CJN

She and her friends would paint nude portraits of themselves in a cabin in the Gatineau Hills.

She was an irrepressible bohemian who preferred New Brunswick to New York City.

Her paintings of Canadian service women during the Second World War symbolized "the power of paint" to express emotions.

We learn all that and more in the new National Film Board of Canada production, Pegi Nicol – Something Dancing About Her by Ottawa filmmaker Michael Ostroff.

"I made the film because I encountered Pegi Nicol when I did the documentary on war artists, Canvas of War," says Ostroff, 55, a native of Montreal.

During the filming of that earlier work, he interviewed Fredericton, N.B. resident, Molly Bobak – a respected artist and contemporary of Nicol.

"She insisted that I do a film on Pegi Nicol and through her contacts, she was able to raise money for me," says Ostroff, who studied film making at York University.

"I told the donors that I wouldn't spend the money until we had a fair chance of the film happening."

He was turned down by all the broadcasters at first. Their attitude was, observes Ostroff: "Who would want to watch a film on a dead and unknown Canadian artist?"

There were even some individuals at the NFB in Toronto who expressed the same attitude when he pitched the idea to them initially.

"But, they were open to talking about it. Then, they considered it and got involved in developing it," says Ostroff.

The film received a standing ovation from a sold out crowd of 500 people at its premiere on Feb. 13 at the National Art Gallery in Ottawa.

As a result of the NFB involvement, the film went into production with a budget of $400,000.

"It (the money) all went onto the screen," says Ostroff.

The film took five years to make – from the time of his conversation with Bobak to its completion in January of this year. Set against the stormy first half of the 20th century, the film adeptly traces the Ottawa born and raised Nicol's – who was christened Margaret Kathleen Nichol – singular but brief life with narration, interviews, still photographs and, most significantly, her glorious paintings.

Michael Ostroff

Ostroff brings all his skill as a filmmaker to bear in this layered and poetical portrait of an artist who died at age 44 in a tenement in Manhattan. Her exceptional last paintings were swarming scenes of city life "inspired by the view from her apartment window."

Ostroff had some artistic differences with the NFB during production. The main problem was over the film's length and direction.

"I was not directing a documentary in the typical way that the NFB sees such films. It's 70 minutes long. The NFB was demanding cuts. If they had made the cuts, the film's pacing would have been ruined," said Ostroff, who – along with Fiona McHugh and Ed Riche – also co-wrote the script.

"They liked what I did and told me to finish this film."

Ostroff studied film making at York University in Toronto and has been making films for the past 30 years.

His other films include Budge: The One True Happiness of F.R. 'Budge' Crawley – a critically praised look at the life of pioneer filmmaker Budge Crawley; Bridging the River of Silence – an investigation of a community's reaction to wife abuse; and Memory & Muscle – an in depth look at the personalities and issues behind the first major public sector union strike in Canada.

"It's a personal film in many ways. There's nothing common or similar in our lives, but I can relate to Pegi Nicol's struggle for recognition of her art. She didn't have much support at all," says Ostroff.

Pegi Nicol – Something Dancing About Her will be screened on June 12 in Winnipeg at the Winnipeg Art Gallery; and, on July 18 on Bravo TV. (Check local listings)

All films are screened at the National Library and Archives Canada, 395 Wellington St., Ottawa.

ISRAELI STUDENT FILMS ON VIEW AT INNIS TOWN HALL

Recent short films made by students of Israel's Sam Spiegel Film and Television School will be screened this week at the Canadian Film Centre's Worldwide Short Film Festival in Toronto. A retrospective of films from the renowned 15-year-old school is featured in the festival's annual film school showcase.

Sam Spiegel films have won more than 180 international awards over the past decade. Recent graduate Nir Bergman's feature film debut, Broken Wings, was a box office hit in Israel, garnering nine Israeli Oscars.

The school "has produced a generation of exceptionally talented filmmakers who are unafraid to take a clear-eyed and sometimes controversial look at their country and its culture," said Shane Smith, artistic director of the Toronto festival.

Innis Town Hall, U of T campus. Free to students and seniors. Friday, June 17, 2 p.m. The festival runs June 14 to 19. www.worldwideshortfilmfest.com

Arts in Brief

• The 17th annual Toronto Fringe Theatre Festival presents "some of the most impassioned, entertaining and unpredictable performances in Toronto." This year's program includes a record 134 companies with 108 indoor shows, to which admission is usually $10 or less. July 6 to 17. Fringe Hotline 416-966-1062, website www.fringetoronto.com

• Like many other large institutions, the Art Gallery of Ontario has taken to polling the public for their opinions, this time about art instead of beer, shopping habits or politics. Having gathered votes all year, the AGO's new exhibition, "Favourites, Your Choices From Our Collection," opened last week. The show features celebrated works by the Group of Seven, Claude Monet, Emily Carr, Paul Cezanne, Henry Moore, Lawren Harris, Pierre Auguste Renoir, Alex Colville and many others. Until January 2006.

• A 17th-century book seized by the Nazis was returned recently to Rome's Jewish community. Published in Amsterdam in 1680, the pocket-sized book contains the first five books of the Bible as well as the books of the prophets. A representative of the Italian Commission for the Recovery of Jewish Bibliographic Heritage returned the sacred treasure to the chief rabbi of Rome.

THE SACRED FEMININE: This painting by Toronto artist Barry Oretsky is one of several on view at Gallery One, 121 Scollard St., Toronto until June 29. Oretsky is a photorealist who brings to mind other photorealists of the 20th century such as Philip Pearlstein, Richard Estes, Chuck Close, Edward Hopper and David Hockney. Knowing instinctively that it was his calling, Oretsky started painting at a very young age. His gift of transferrring what he sees to canvas is unique. He selects the moments and places that he finds most interesting to freeze. Subjects are chosen for their depth and drama: the juxtaposition of time, light and experience. Movie mogul Lew Wasserman dominated Hollywood

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Lew Wasserman died about three years ago, but his legacy looms large.

Wasserman, the president of the Music Corporation of America, was the most powerful individual in the Hollywood film and television industry in his day.

He bought Universal Studios, parlayed a pedestrian studio tour into a $1 billion-a-year theme park business, launched the careers of George Lucas (American Graffiti) and Amy Heckerling (Fast Times at Ridgemont High) and greenlighted blockbuster films such as Animal House and Jurassic Park.

He made the first 90-minute TV show, The Virginian, and the first min-series, Rich Man, Poor Man.

And he was the first person to turn a studio into an entertainment conglomerate, replete with book, magazine and music label divisions. His admirers facetiously called it "Wasserland."

But long before he built and assumed control of this empire, he was a talent agent who represented movie stars ranging from Kirk Douglas and Joan Crawford to Gregory Peck and Bette Davis.

Wasserman and his wife Edie, who was his indispensable right hand, are the subjects of Kathleen Sharp's competent biography, Mr. & Mrs. Hollywood. It is published in a new paperback edition by Carroll & Graf and distributed in Canada by the Publishers Group.

The pair, both from Cleveland, met in 1935, drawn together by a mutual love of music and, as Sharp puts it, by "a passion for the ritz."

He, the ambitious son of Russian-Jewish immigrants, was a booking agent for bands. She was the brainy, headstrong daughter of a German-Jewish businessman named Henry Beckerman.

Although Sharp – a reporter who covers Hollywood for the Boston Globe – tries hard to give them equal billing, the more interesting subject by far is Lew.

His wife was a fount of useful information, a great hostess, a philanthropist who raised $50 million dollars for a hospital, and the person who introduced her husband to Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis.

Her story may be worth telling, but in comparison to the inimitable Wasserman, she appears to have been a relatively minor figure in Hollywood, Sharp's inflated take of her notwithstanding.

Wasserman, whose career in Hollywood began in 1939, was dictatorial and paternalistic, hewed to an extremely hands-on management style and raised his voice loudly when the performance of an employee fell short of his exacting standards.

"Work hard," he told his agents. "There are no shortcuts."

Throughout his life, Wasserman cultivated good relations with journalists, knowing they could burnish his image. "Never fight with the press," he said. "They always have the last word."

Sartorially immaculate, and sporting trademark oversized eye glasses, Wasserman was quite a boulevardier. His motto was "Dress British, think Yiddish." It kept him in good stead when he negotiated what Sharp describes as "cruel, lopsided" deals.

Lew Wasserman and his wife, Edie.

Wasserman had an unfair advantage over his competitors because MCA was able to buy and sell talent, the only agency able to do so. This was due to a deal he had signed with the Screen Actors Guild back in 1952.

He and his longtime boss, Jules Stein, acquired Universal by circuitous means, first buying its real estate holdings and then purchasing the studio itself.

Although his acumen was legendary, Wasserman was capable of making gargantuan mistakes.

He passed on Lucas' script for Raiders of the Lost Ark – which Steven Spielberg would direct – for purely financial reasons. Wasserman thought that Lucas was demanding "unheard-of-percentages" in terms of ownership. The film, which cost $20 million to shoot, earned $400 million worldwide.

Once in a while, Wasserman's business decisions were dictated by his Jewish roots. On the advice of his wife, who opposed films that were "too Jewish," he refrained from turning Budd Schulberg's iconic novel, What Makes Sammy Run, into a movie. To Wasserman, the tale of a coarse, backstabbing Hollywood hustler like Sammy Glick was simply "too negative."

A man as rich and influential as Wasserman was naturally courted by politicians. After winning the U.S. presidential election in 1964, Lyndon Baines Johnson asked him to be his secretary of commerce. Wasserman turned him down, not eager to exchange Hollywood for Washington, D.C.

When it came to politics, Wasserman preferred to work behind the scenes. Sensing that a fairly obscure governor from Arkansas had potential, he and his wife supported Bill Clinton's run for the presidency.

"Edie and Lew could smell power," the screenwriter and novelist Dominick Dunne said.

By the 1990s, Wasserman was in decline, at least as far as his real power was concerned. He had unloaded MCA for $6 billion some years earlier on condition he would have a guaranteed lifetime position there. According to Sharp, the sale was the biggest buyout ever of an American company by a Japanese firm.

Without Wasserman's knowledge, Edgar Bronfman, Jr., the son of Canadian tycoon Edgar Bronfman, purchased 80 per cent of MCA in 1995 for $5.7 billion from the Japanese investors who had bought MCA in the first place.

Bronfman Sr. called Wasserman, his old friend, to inform him of the transaction. But Wasserman was outraged he had been shut out of the loop. He was angrier still when Bronfman manoeuvered him off MCA board.

Still, he continued working at his 14th floor office inside the Lew Wasserman building, taking calls, greeting visitors and surfing the Internet.

Wasserman died on June 3, 2002 after having suffered a heart attack and being placed on life support, and was buried in a quiet ceremony.

At the memorial service, he was eulogized by, among others, Clinton, two former first ladies – Lady Bird Johnson and Nancy Reagan – and a galaxy of actors and directors running the gamut from Sharon Stone to Ron Howard.

A Hollywood patriarch in the mould of Louis B. Mayer had passed from the scene, and everyone knew it.

Plea bargain accepted in vandalism case

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Lawyers for the Crown and a young man charged with defacing Jewish institutions have agreed to a plea bargain on a charge of simple mischief instead of a more serious offence involving the defacement of religious institutions.

Steven Vandermey, 19, last week pleaded guilty to five counts of mischief in connection with an anti-Semitic spree along Bathurst Street that shocked the Jewish community. In March 2004, Vandermey and two young offenders destroyed and defaced UJA Federation signs, smeared graffiti on a Jewish school, vandalized a B'nai Brith donation box, threw rocks through the windows of the Pride of Israel Synagogue and overturned numerous headstones in Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park Cemetery.

Two months ago, the two young offenders pleaded guilty to simple mischief. In that case, the trial judge rejected the more serious Criminal Code offence of causing mischief to religious property (section 430), which requires proof of motivation by hate, bias or prejudice. Judge Walter Gonet said the two young people, who were 15 at the time, committed the mischief in order to get themselves on television.

Canadian Jewish Congress said the Crown's acceptance of Vandermey's guilty plea was "a disgrace."

"While the evidentiary requirements may have led the Crown to determine that it could not secure a conviction on the more serious charges, we are frustrated that the conclusion to this case does not seem to take into account the traumatic effect of these incidents on both the Jewish and wider communities," said Joel Richler, chair of Congress' Ontario region.

Len Rudner, Congress' director of community relations for the Ontario region, said the Crown's decision to accept the plea bargain fails "to send a strong message out to other people watching this."

He noted that Vandermey and his two accomplices worked their way up Bathurst Street between Finch and Steeles avenues, vandalizing Jewish institutions.

"There are a lot of buildings they could have targeted. The fact of the matter is they went specifically for property that belonged to the Jewish community," he said. "If this isn't what section 430 is meant to deal with, what's it here for?

"The Crown laid the charges and the Crown should have persevered and let the court decide whether there's sufficient evidence," Rudner suggested.

B'nai Brith Canada also condemned the plea bargain.

"We cannot accept that this outcome reflects the intent of the law," said Frank Dimant, the organization's executive vice-president. "The case must be viewed against the backdrop of the disturbing upward swing of anti-Semitism in Canada, as documented in our own Audit of Antisemitic Incidents. The entire Jewish community has been hung out to dry in a decision that could have adverse effects on other minority groups that might be targeted by this type of vandalism. The failure to recognize the hate-motivated aspects of this crime, which shook our community to the core, leaves a message of trivialization that will only encourage others to act out their prejudices."

The young offenders, who cannot be named, will be sentenced later this month while Vandermey will appear in court again on July 4.

97-year-old Baycrest volunteer honoured

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Longtime Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care volunteer Pauline Nelson, 97, was recently honoured for her work in the office of Baycrest's audiology department.

Nelson has been a volunteer at Baycrest for the past 27 years. She goes to the centre by Wheel-Trans.

Sonia Reichman, director of the department of communications disorders at Baycrest, said, "She is a remarkable women. She is dedicated, very able and doesn't miss a day or a minute of her volunteer time.

"Everyone who comes in contact with her is inspired by her. She is a role model in healthy and active aging."

Nelson (née Frishoff) was born in 1907 in Moinseti, in the district of Bacau in Romania.

In 1945, she married Michael Nelson in Romania and the following year they moved to France. Her husband was a military uniform designer in Romania. The Nelsons and their son, Fred, moved to Hamilton in 1951 and to Toronto the following year.

In an interview with Pauline at her residence, Forest Hill Place, she says that when she arrived in Canada she couldn't speak a word of English.

"I had the guts to apply for an office job and they hired me at Macmillan Publishing because I spoke French," she says.

She worked at the publishing company for 26 years and retired in 1976. The following year, she became a volunteer for ORT and for the Baycrest Foundation, before beginning her work in Baycrest's audiology department.

"For many years, I worked four days a week. I found that four days was too much for me and I work two days a week now," she says.

She adds, "I would do any kind of office work except computer. At my age, I think it is too hard to learn new tricks."

Reichman says that Nelson keeps others at Baycrest on their toes. "She is so conscientious. She makes us all energized."

Nelson was honoured by her co-workers at Baycrest with a party at which she was presented with a scrapbook documenting her volunteer activities over the years.

Pauline Nelson, 97, was recently honoured for her work in the office of Baycrest's audiology department.

"Pauline has a second career in volunteering," Reichman says. "It is as long as her career in publishing."

Shirley Nelson, Pauline's daughter-in-law, says, "My mother-in-law is too modest to speak of all her other volunteer and charitable activities."

Nelson formed a knitting club at her retirement residence and she loves teaching knitting and crocheting. She makes hats, mitts and sweaters for children, which she gives to the Jewish Family &Child Services for distribution. She also knits and crochets gifts for her three great-grandchildren and for friends.

"She does the Jumble puzzle [in the Toronto Star] every day," says Shirley. "She is a great Scrabble player and often beats me."

Looking back, Nelson says she has one regret in life: "While I was living in France, I should have taken courses at the Sorbonne. My father died after I graduated with my matriculation in Romania and I had to go to work."

Her busy days include exercise several times a week. She speaks of the joy she gets from her family.

"And I've made wonderful friends at Baycrest, and I'm especially very proud of my special friendships in the communications disorder department. They are like sisters to me," she says.

"I've received so much from my volunteer work – I suggest that others do the same."

At the end of our interview, Nelson jests, "You may be able to reach me by e-mail in the near future."

Israel to host IIHF junior tournament in March

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Olympic rink in Metulla's Canada Centre has seen plenty of ice events, everything from kids hockey to recreational skating to ice dance to short track speed skating.

Soon the old barn can expect something new.

From March 13 to 20, Canada Centre will host the 2006 IIHF World Under-18 Division III Championship.

The tournament will mark the first time the Jewish state has hosted an international hockey event of such magnitude, said Alan Maislin, chair of the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel.

"It's good for Metulla, it's good for the Canada Centre and hopefully it will help us promote hockey in Israel," Maislin said.

The event will pit Israel, this year's Division III bronze medal winner, against teams from Romania, South Africa, New Zealand, Bulgaria and Turkey.

The decision to award Israel the tournament was made by the IIHF at its recent congress in Vienna, Austria. Romania was also in the running to host the tournament, but the IIHF congress voted 64-25 in favour of Israel.

The event could prove a financial boon to Israel's minor hockey program, Maislin said. Fan support at the 1,000-seat arena, along with sponsorships, IIHF funding and perhaps contributions from the Israeli government, will permit the Israeli hockey federation to make some money from the event.

Sergei Matin, president of the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel, said Israel is making advances on a number of hockey fronts.

The federation hopes to ice a woman's team at the IIHF World Women's Championships in 2007. Although efforts to bring together a female team are "only at the starting stage," he said there are a couple of women in Metulla who practise and play with the junior boys. There are also a few Israeli women in the Diaspora who could help round out the team.

The federation is also examining the possibility of recruiting disabled players who might participate in Paralympic competitions as members of other countries' teams. Eventually, he said, Israel might ice a team of its own.

Introducing Israel into the hockey world gives the country a profile it might not otherwise possess. "We want people to think about sports and not the other stuff that happens in Israel," Maislin said.

Maislin and other supporters of Israeli hockey have put together an ambitious agenda to grow the sport in the Jewish state.

First up is a Canadian tryout for spots on the junior and senior national teams.

Peter Friedmann, general manager of the junior team, said the tryout camp will be held on June 17 at the Canadian Ice Academy at Dundas Street and Highway 427, west of Toronto.

Players must either have an Israeli passport or be capable of getting one because at least one of their parents has one, and they should also be able to play at an AA level or at least be a very good A-level player, Friedmann said.

The evaluation camp will be supervised by Jean Perron, the junior and senior teams' bench boss, along with Philadelphia Flyers head coach Ken Hitchcock, Maislin said.

Alan Maislin (left), Sergei Matin (centre) and Jean Perron are key figures in the Israeli hockey program.

Beginning on July 31, Canada Centre will host a hockey school and training camp for the junior and senior teams under Perron's supervision, with Hitchcock's participation, if his NHL schedule permits.

On Oct. 14, the junior team will kick off a North American tour with stops in Florida, Philadelphia, New York, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto and Winnipeg.

From Jan. 24 to 26, 2006, Metulla will host the "A.K. tournament," short for alte kackers, or old timers, said Maislin. "It's sort of a hockey mission to Israel," and will be a fun way for casual skaters to support the development of hockey in Israel, he added.

Things turn more serious in March when Metulla hosts the Under-18 event, and then a month later in Amiens, France, members of the senior team will lace up their skates in IIHF World Championship Division I play, only one level below the elite grouping that includes Canada, the United States, the Czech Republic and Russia.

Israel's opponents in Division I include France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Holland, Britain, Hungary and Japan. Many of the teams consist of professional players, Maislin noted.

Israeli advanced to Division I after winning the Division II, Group B gold medal in April.

In other developments, a group of investors is scheduled to be in Israel this week to pursue plans for development of a rink in the Tel Aviv area. The group is looking at it as a purely commercial venture.

The Israeli hockey federation would be keen to play out of a rink in the central part of the country.

Matin said such a rink would radically improve the country's hockey prospects by making the sport accessible to large numbers of young people. It would also help attract the attention of the Israeli sports media.

The country's hockey teams receive only modest coverage in the domestic media. "It looks like we're better known outside [Israel] than inside," Matin said.

Maccabi auction extended

Maccabi Canada has extended its online auction to June 12.

The fundraising auction, which is being managed by Auctionwire, an online auction management company, features prizes that include a 60-inch Sony high definition TV, a hang-gliding adventure, use of a Toronto Blue Jays SkyBox, PlayStation games and a Whistler getaway, said Auctionwire president Josh Gold.

The online auction can be accessed at http://charityauction.auctionwire.ca/ or by clicking the link at www.maccabicanada.com.

'Junkyard Dog' to meet teens at Chabad@Flamingo

Jerome "Junkyard Dog" Williams, the former Toronto Raptor turned New York Knick, may have moved south of the border to play basketball, but he's returning to Toronto this week to demonstrate his coaching skills.

Williams was scheduled to meet with hundreds of teens at Thornhill's Chabad@Flamingo in a "Tricks and Hoops" program that will promote the importance of community involvement and positive life choices.

The event, sponsored by Irwin Michael, president of ABC Funds, will include a basketball demonstration by Williams, an autograph-signing session, a raffle for autographed apparel, and free CD giveaways. A special performance by rapper QTMC is also on tap.

The program takes place at Chabad@Flamingo, 8001 Bathurst Street, on Wednesday, June 8, from 5 to 6:30 p.m.

Chabad@Flamingo is organizing the event to reward the 100 teenagers who participated in the centre's after-school program, Torah for Teens, over the last year.

The teens, in grades 9 through 12, have been meeting at the centre once a week to participate in sports and social activities, while learning life skills and Jewish values. The program, which was introduced two years ago with 10 registered students, is expected to draw about 250 teens for the coming school year.

"This event is a fitting reward for the teens, as there's a strong synergy between the messages Jerome Williams promotes and our own teachings at Chabad@Flamingo," said Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, spiritual leader at Chabad@Flamingo.

Williams runs a non-profit foundation that encourages youth to "believe in themselves, do their best, set goals, dream, give back, stay in school and say no to drugs," among other messages.

As part of the event, Chabad@Flamingo was to unveil a community tutoring program, to be launched in September, that will pair volunteer high school students with elementary pupils for once-a-week tutoring, sports and social activities at the centre.

Registration for the event is $10 per person. For more information or to register, call 905-763-4040, or visit www.chabadflamingo.com.

What colour is your bracelet?

By MIRIAM PORTER

A few months ago I was exercising at the gym and noticed virtually everyone around me wearing colourful rubber bracelets. The guy on the treadmill wore a yellow one; the woman next to him a pink one; and the girl on the elliptical machine beside me had four bracelets in different colours halfway up her arm.

I looked down at my own bare arms and had a brief flashback to Hebrew school when everyone but me wore the "right" clothes and I felt I didn't belong. However, I have since learned these stylish bracelets are much more meaningful than the Polo shirt or Lacoste jacket I longed for as a child but could not afford.

The first rubber (silicone) bracelet was launched last year, on May 17. The yellow wristband called LIVESTRONG is the product of a partnership between the Lance Armstrong Foundation, (LAF – founded in 1997 by world-renowned cyclist Lance Armstrong) and Nike. It was established in an effort to raise funds for programs that help people with cancer live strong – like Armstrong himself. It sells for $1 (US). More than 47.5 million LIVESTRONG wristbands have now been purchased. The Lance Armstrong Foundation believes that "in your battle with cancer, knowledge is power and attitude is everything."

"Nike set a goal to raise at least $5 million for the LAF, mostly through the sale of LIVESTRONG wristbands, and donated an additional $1 million. LIVESTRONG wristbands represent unity in the battle against cancer and hope for all those who are living with cancer. Wristbands have been sold to citizens of all 50 states, more than 60 countries and on every continent. Since the launch of the campaign, wristbands have been spotted on a number of athletes, Olympians, musicians, actors and political leaders."

The yellow bracelet and the LAF's programs became famous in part because they were highly publicized on television's Oprah Winfrey Show.

After the unbelievable success and popularity of the LIVESTRONG campaign, it didn't take long for other charities to enter the silicone bracelet market to help bring awareness to their own causes.

Some examples include red bracelets for AIDS research with the words, "Make A Difference" and green bracelets for the environment with the slogan, "Save Our Earth."

The Pink Bracelet Fund promotes breast cancer awareness. Singer Melissa Etheridge, who was diagnosed with breast cancer, supports the fund. This bracelet is inscribed, "Be Strong – MLE."

The Susan G. Komen Breast Cancer Foundation also designed pink bracelets emblazoned with its motto, "Sharing the Promise."

There are bracelets to raise awareness for Tsunami relief efforts, the troops in Iraq, child abuse, leukemia, impaired driving, Alzheimer's disease, hunger, racial intolerance and more.

At a Shabbat dinner recently, I received my first rubber bracelet. The blue bracelet in support of Israel was inscribed with the words "Yad Chazaka"(Strong Hand). Proceeds from this bracelet help small Israeli groups that sometimes go unnoticed, such as non-profit organizations in the fields of health, science, sports, education, religion and culture. Many of these organizations have been established to help improve Israeli society. The proceeds from the sales of this bracelet ($1 US) go directly to participating organizations to support their continuing work on behalf of Israel.

Yad Chazaka believes its program will not only help teach children the importance of giving tzedakah but also teach them the importance of participating in acts of chesed (kindness).

I believe it's crucial these colourful bracelets act as a form of communication; a way to raise funds and be a reminder of the importance of charity in our world – not just become the latest fashion statement or fad.

When I wear my blue bracelet, I make sure to explain the meaning behind it and talk about Israel. It is the message behind the bracelets we must remember.

Informal education can't stand alone

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

In April (CJN, April 14), I wrote about the importance of blending formal study that promotes Jewish literacy with informal modes of education that foster identity. I noted that it is not only important to work simultaneously in both spheres, but to break down old borders and cross traditional lines by introducing informal techniques into schooling and actual study into camps, youth groups and Israel experiences.

The central message of Shavuot, Zman Matan Toratenu, reminds me that I could easily have been misunderstood regarding informal education. We are taught that this holiday calls itself the time of giving the Torah, not the time of receiving the Torah, so that we can clearly understand our role as responsible Jews. God gave the Torah at Sinai (at one time and at one place in history), but our never-ending task is to keep receiving the Torah – that is to study and re-study it, always interpreting the sacred text into our ever-changing lives.

The only danger in informal education is if someone were to think of it as a replacement or substitute for ongoing, deep study of Jewish language, texts, history, culture, and values. It is a complement and sometimes a life-critical portal to the richness of the Jewish past, the engagement of the Jewish present and the creative potential of our future. But it's never a substitute.

A young innocent who gets "turned on" to Jewish life, engaged in his or her identity or enthused by the Zionist revolution is just at the very beginning of a wondrous trip. If he or she stops there and does not find the way to study our sources, we will have raised yet another generation of ignorant Jews, not quite sure what it is they identify with, albeit enthusiastically. It could just as easily be Tibetan Buddhism, another engaging tale.

While the spectacle of Sinai was wilder than any summer camp program, it was meant to inspire us to a life of study, not a life of Jewish identity. The informal sphere has powerful potential, but there must always be something profound behind the door that it opens.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Raphael Yelin, creation of God

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Rich men and prestigious women often live lives surrounded by droves of people. When their days are through, important leaders eulogize them. They are led to their gravesite by police escort and the hearse that carries them is followed by those who knew them and others who benefited from their wealth or expertise.

Then there are others who share the same world but never seemed to have life figured out. We see them walking briskly, carrying plastic bags filled with paper bags, tattered socks, plastic forks, bits of tin foil and a torn novel. Although their strides seem to be taking them somewhere, they always end up going nowhere. Although they crave to be someone, you know they feel invisible, like no one.

Raphael Yelin – Raffy – was one such community member. He was a strong, frequently obstreperous figure, but, unbeknownst to many, soft when faithfully loved. But Raffy was mostly sad and lost. He died recently – a young man in his forties.

We all know people like Raffy. They are family, or strangers who stand next to us in shul or at kiosks. They tug at our heartstrings. They do because we know they were once little too and played silly games just like we did. They do because we know there is little we can offer them, and that, tragically, luck looks askance when they need it the most, whereas providence visits us more regularly, even when we don't call for it.

People like Raffy make us think. We watch them as they fidget, sometimes cursing loudly into the breeze, and we consider our mazel (luck) at having been held safely against our mother's breasts as a child; at having sat proudly on our father's shoulders as we trekked merrily through our invented jungle; at being blessed to have discovered our passion and a place in our community.

Few people attended Raffy's funeral. Not many cars lined the roadway circling the cemetery. Yet those who did were people who loved Raffy and valued him because they knew him.

This column is in memory of Raphael Yelin, a creation of God, and those who ceaselessly search for what most of us have – purpose and shalom (peace). God bless your soul Raffy. We hope that you have in heaven what unfairly passed you by here on earth.

The following poem was written by Raffy's uncle, Sheldon Richmond, who read it at his interment.

For Raffy

He asked us for shoes, and we gave him shoes. He asked us for money, and we gave him money. But did we give him what he really needed? He asked us for burgers, and we gave him burgers. He asked us for smokes, and we gave him smokes. But did we give him what he really needed? We told him what to do, and we say he didn't listen. We gave him words of wisdom, and we say he didn't hear. But did we give him the comfort and love that he really needed? We say he was his own worst enemy, but who isn't?

We told him to look after himself, but who does? We reminded him that if you are not for yourself, who will be? We reminded him that if you are only for yourself, what are you?

We told him if not now, when? But who doesn't need reminding and telling? Like us did he have helpmates? Like us did he have soulmates? Like us did he have luck? If we had no luck if we had no soulmates, if we had no helpmates, where would we be?

Let us now pray that the schchinah (God) cradles his neshamah (soul) in the warmth of her arms and gives him the love that he needs. Amen.

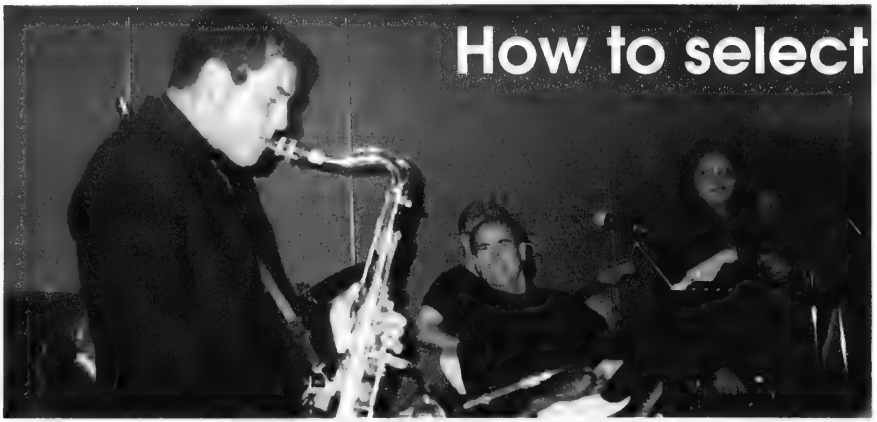
How to select the best band for your party



Joe Star's nine-piece band performs throughout the reception.

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When selecting the best band for your affair, look for a group of professional musicians with a versatile musical repertoire, strong chemistry between band members and most importantly, an ensemble that has a solid reputation, says Joe Star of the Joe Star Band.

"When you come and see the band, there is so much involved – the songs, the band together and, of course, word of mouth is important," says Star, whose band has been together for 15 years.

"You want a band with a good reputation."

Star (905-881-1378) says reputation is based on years of satisfying clients and a band's reputation develops by catering to the wishes of the people putting on the affair and the crowd that's dancing to the music.

"I work for the client. I don't work for me," says the band leader, who has toiled in the business for more than 30 years.

"I do what my client wants me to do… and if the crowd likes certain music, like Israeli music, then I'll do more Israeli music."

The more versatile the band, the better able they are to satisfy, says Danny Pollak of the True Sound band (905-731-7585, 416-455-9055).

"To be a musician in a wedding, you have to know millions of tunes," says the band leader and drummer, who previously led the Select Band.

"You never know who will come and ask you to play a certain song."

Pollak relates the story of a guest at a wedding who asked him if he could play some rather obscure Hungarian music.

Tapping into his vast musical knowledge, he came up with the tune.

"I got the crowd to melt in my hands," he recalls.

Star notes his nine-piece band is versatile, playing everything from chassidic tunes to Moroccan beats.

Likewise, Pollak says his band spans the spectrum of cultures, busting out harmonies and grooves from famous tangos to rhythm and blues.

Typically, Star says he'll play between 50 and 60 songs a night.

"I usually give the clients a song list and ask them to highlight the stuff they like and to highlight songs they don't want," he notes.

As for playing time, Star says the flutist, piano player and saxophonist generally play at various points during the ceremony and cocktails, while the entire nine-piece band performs throughout the reception, which usually lasts five hours.

He notes it's important for the band to either tone down or up, depending on what stage the affair is at.

"During dinner… the band has to be soft so people can talk and enjoy the music at the same time," he says.

Beyond the music, Pollak says bands should add a scintillating entertainment factor.

"You want a band that moves on stage," he says.

"You want to see a show, where the band is dancing, playing and making the people happy."

Pollak says bands are a collective effort and he advises clients to seek out a group in which there is good chemistry between the players on stage.

"Don't just look for a good singer, look at the whole band," advises Pollak, whose band boasts 10 members.

"Look at the whole picture, the atmosphere they give."

Star agrees.

"You need a good singer, but who makes the singer look good? It's the whole connection together," he says.

Dress like a princess on your big day

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Cinderella didn't go to the prince's ball dressed like a servant. After her fairy godmother conjured up a beautiful crystal-studded gown, matching shoes and satchel, she agreed to attend and had the time of her life.

Even if you don't have a fairy godmother, you too can dress like Cinderella at Edith's Fashions (416-633-4222). The Downsview store boasts 8,000 square feet of frocks for brides, their mothers and guests.

"We are the biggest and most equipped store in the world for mothers of the bride," says owner Joe Nourani.

Edith's gets dress shipments twice a year, but the shipments are staggered and it can take up to 10 weeks for the full season's merchandise to arrive, often from Italy.

Edith's salespeople keep lists to make sure that the mothers of the bride and groom don't buy similar dresses. They also know that not every dress will fit every body type, so they are careful to make sure that every woman only sees the dresses that are best suited for her. This eliminates cringe-worthy moments that come from trying on the wrong style.

"You can't put the same dress on a woman who's size eight and a woman who's size 20," Nourani says.

The store's six seamstresses can also do custom work, adding or removing sleeves as needed, hemming dresses and otherwise altering clothing so it fits customers perfectly. Edith's also has an in-house milliner who makes custom hats, and sells all the accessories a bride needs to complete her outfit. Although they don't sell shoes, if brides buy white sneakers, the milliner will decorate them with beading.

"Ninety-nine per cent of the time we can dress you," says Nourani. "But we don't have cheap merchandise. Everything we have is the best quality."

Prices for wedding dresses start at $850, while dresses in the diamond room – those with designer labels – start at $1,000.

Nourani advises ordering wedding dresses or any other gown that requires major alterations well in advance of your function. Doing so will ensure that seamstresses aren't rushed to alter the dress when it arrives.

Joy Cherry, a 4,000-square-foot upscale boutique, caters exclusively to mothers of the bride and groom (416-489-7973).

It's a chic store with personalized service, Cherry says, and it carries many couture gowns. Lace and printed chiffon gowns are big this year, she adds. The store also sells accessories and shoes.

Customers should know their colour schemes before they walk in the door, Cherry suggests. Women should also come in with an open mind and be willing to discard any previously conceived notions of which styles look good on them. She says customers should rely on the salespeople to find styles that suit their body types best.

"Trust them to figure out what's best," she says.

Eventworks party novelties are permanent mementoes

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

No one would gainsay the importance of food and entertainment, in making party guests happy. Once the party's over, though, these things are gone.

However, something like a photo, for example, can be kept forever, to help preserve something of the special feeling that makes a party memorable.

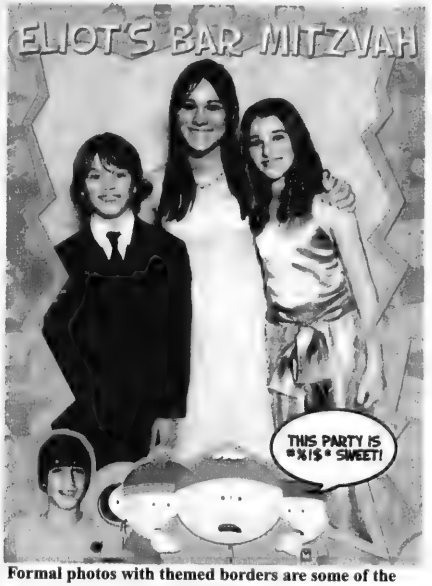
Over the past 3½ years, partners Ariel Platt and Daniel Malen have built a business on photo novelties and other special items for parties called Eventworks (416-482-3984, www.eventworks.ca).

Of the two partners, Platt does the promotion, while Malen, a graduate of Sheridan College, does the photo and design work. They're always looking for new ideas, some of which they generate themselves and some of which come from clients.

Eventworks has become known for creating digital photo novelties and other customized party keepsakes. These include magnets, mouse pads, key chains, T-shirts and socks. They also have ways to make the invitations more interesting.

There's a lot you can do with a camera: formal photos for events such as graduations; framed photos with captions, and/or themed borders; photos of guests, with a picture of the bar or bat mitzvah boy or girl as an inset.

Some ideas are more elaborate. For example, Eventworks can set up a photo booth; do a "Speakers' Corner" booth with a live interviewer, with a clip to go online; or it can design a magazine or newspaper mockup for an event.



Formal photos with themed borders are some of the concepts designed by Eventworks.

Eventworks can also design a logo for a bar or bat mitzvah kid. Or, to let the kids design their own, Eventworks staff can bring pop culture logos with them to your event.

Kids like to put logos on socks because they take their shoes off to dance. Eventworks can offer each guest a pair of socks, one with a guest's design and one with the bar or bat mitzvah kid's logo. Or, since kids take their jackets off and dance in T-shirts, guests might like to put logos on them.

"We work constantly with our clients to come up with fun ideas," Platt says. "And while kids like our work, so do adults. Grandparents, for example, love to be photographed with their grandchildren."

No matter how many new ideas she and her team can come up with, Platt says, certain items have enduring popularity. The most popular idea is the 5x7 framed photo, for bar and bat mitzvahs, weddings and corporate events.

Eventworks is versatile, ready to adapt to your needs as a host. Platt and Malen can offer something for every budget, from modest to large, and for every size of event up to hundreds of guests. And they and their team can work in any environment, from an intimate house party to a black-tie gala.

While Eventworks has done a lot of work at bar and bat mitzvahs, the partners' experience is quite diverse. It ranges from proms and graduations through golf tournaments to corporate gatherings and fundraisers.

They operate during cocktails and dancing. "You don't have to line up for us," Platt says. "And we don't steal attention from the main party."

Eventworks photos and other items are made from durable materials and stand the test of time. And if a wealth of fun ideas is one reason for the company's success, a high standard of customer service is another.

Eventworks has a separate passport-protected area of its website that's only accessible to guests. A guest's picture is posted on the site within 48 hours of an event and stays up for three months.

Platt advises you to book Eventworks early – at least six months ahead of your party. She says the Eventworks team can do up to seven events a night, but dates can fill up fast.

Satisfy your sweet tooth with chocolate treats

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

What better way to satisfy the cravings of your family and friends, than with a decadent, flowing fountain of rich, warm, Belgian chocolate?

At Chocolate Moose (416-784 9092), Bev Kruger and her staff can adorn your simchah with just that.

Perhaps the fastest growing trend when it comes to delicious party desserts, chocolate fountains allow your guests to dip fruit, marshmallows and just about anything else you can think of in warmed chocolate.

"We provide chocolate fountains, the equipment and the chocolate. They have become pretty popular. Over the past two years, the more people see it at parties, the more popular it becomes," Kruger said.

But if cascading cocoa isn't your thing, the more traditional forms of chocolate provided by Chocolate Moose, as well as Chocolate Charm (416-787-4256), are sure to satisfy a sweet tooth.

"The three main things we do are smash cakes, three-tier cakes for weddings and bar mitzvahs, and lollypops and bonbonnieres [dishes of chocolate]," said Bob Levine, who runs Chocolate Charm.

"The bonbonniere boxes come in all shapes and sizes – cutouts of hearts and pillow boxes.

"We bring chocolate from Belgium and Switzerland and use real liqueur," he added.

At Chocolate Moose, Kruger also specializes in chocolate, all of which comes from Belgium, but she also makes other kinds of candy, such as nougat.

Both Levine and Kruger boast that everything they sell is made on the premises, and both agree that special orders should be placed in advance.

"We have walk-in customers that come in and buy what they need," said Kruger. "Others call and order for weddings and bar mitzvahs."

Kruger asked that customers give her at least a couple weeks to complete a large order.

Of course, she warned, the bigger or more unusual the order, the more time needed to complete it.

"It depends on how intricate and different the request is," she said.

"We do make novelty pieces. I have hundreds of moulds. If there's a bar mitzvah with a hockey theme, they may want chocolate in the form of hockey sticks."

Levine agrees that it's wise to give your chocolatier plenty of advanced notice to ensure an order is ready on time.

"For fancier orders, you should put the order in early. If someone wants a particular shape, we would have to find the mould for the shape first. We once had an order for a lacrosse stick," he said.

For special events, Levine suggests getting an order in as early as three or four months in advance, while regular boxes of chocolate can be prepared within a few weeks.

Only seven years ago, Kruger was operating out of a shul basement. She said she owes her store's success to her wonderful staff and their flexible work ethic.

"We stand behind our product and we always try to accommodate our customers as best as we can," she said.

Levine also takes his line of work very seriously, and he prides himself on his product.

"People often compliment us for our quality. We specialize in chocolate and we stick with chocolate," he said.

Kosher excellence and elegant ambience on offer at Baycrest and King Solomon's Table

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

"Everybody's got a hungry heart" as the Bruce Springsteen song goes, but you don't want guests at your function getting off to a famished start.

For many, it's the food that makes a party. Where else can you sample crêpes and exotic salads and enjoy a decadent chocolate fountain dessert, all in the same meal?

Two venues offering kosher culinary excellence in equally superb settings are Baycrest Hospitality Services and King Solomon's Table.

The staff at Baycrest Hospitality Services (416-785-2500, ext. 2477) are very flexible when planning a function. If they can accommodate a request, they will. They are only inflexible in their quest for excellence.

Many happy couples have been married at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, taking advantage of the beautifully landscaped gardens both for pre-wedding photos and the ceremony itself.

Sharon Bizouati, Baycrest's manager of hospitality services, says Baycrest can accommodate from 10 to 500 guests. Event specialists are available to aid in planning, and the air-conditioned facilities are fully wired with modern sound, lighting and audio-visual systems.

"We usually sit down with the client and create a menu for them," Bizouati says.

The added bonus of holding a function at Baycrest is that all proceeds go to the centre.

"It generates revenue for the facility, the profits all go back to Baycrest," Bizouati says. "That's why [Baycrest Hospitality Services] was created."

Mark Bernick held his daughter's bat mitzvah party there and speaks with enthusiasm about Baycrest.

"It's like the best kept secret. I would recommend it to anyone. Every single person who worked at our simchah was incredible. They were so kind and pleasant and they're very flexible in meeting your needs."

King Solomon's Table (416-630-1666) is known for its Chinese buffet. That and other delicious creations are available for your next simchah.

The restaurant actually has two kitchens – one continental and the other a Chinese facility that is totally nut-free.

"The Chinese is an attraction. We do a lot of simchahs that are Chinese buffet," explains maitre d' Albert Massaro.

For those seeking something else, he adds, "we offer a complete continental meal with full service." The comprehensive menu offers a mouth-watering selection that includes Cajun chicken linguine, filet mignon and Moroccan cigars.

Baycrest can accommodate from 10 to 500 guests.

A specialty that is often requested at functions is "Chicken Supreme" – chicken breast stuffed with young spinach, walnuts and anjou pears, glazed with a honey ginger orange sauce.

Dishes typically prepared with nuts can also be ordered nut-free, if desired.

The choices don't end there. "We have an extensive selection of kosher wine, from the traditional to Australian, Chilean, Californian or Italian," notes Massaro.

The venue seats 310, and with ample free parking and an ambiance to be enjoyed on its own or enhanced to match a chosen colour scheme, the site is perfect for private functions.

For those requiring more seating, King Solomon's Table is the exclusive caterer at the Madison Convention Centre, which can accommodate up to 800 guests. The staff have also catered a house party for 250 people.

King Solomon's Table also gets many repeat customers celebrating various life-cycle events.

"For some people, we've done the engagement, the wedding and the baby naming. There's a lot of repeat business," Massaro says.

Liven up the party with great give-aways

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

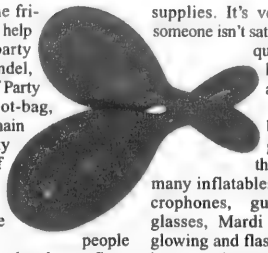
If you want your child's bar or bat mitzvah party to be a hit with the kids there are some basic ingredients you can't do without.

A dynamic disc jockey can certainly get the kids dancing, although the girls really don't need much encouragement.

If you want to get the boys on the dance floor and keep them moving all night, the trick is to hand out prizes. They love the little toys and trinkets, the wigs, the gangster hats, the derbies, the flashing magnetic jewelry, the glowing neon necklaces and the inflatable instruments. Boys will be boys and how they love their toys.

Party packages keep the kids entertained.

Of course, everyone appreciates the give-aways, including the adults. The sparkles and the lights add to the frivolity of the simchah and help people get into the party spirit, says Howard Mandel, merchandise manager of Party Packagers, the toy, loot-bag, novelty and stationary chain that specializes in party supplies for all kinds of events.



"The purpose of the give-aways is to get the people on the dance floor and get them interactive," Mandel says. "It keeps the kids entertained and the distraction keeps them out of trouble."

Party Packagers, with nine store in the GTA, are all well-stocked, he adds.

"We have the largest selection of any party retailer in Canada. We have over 5,000 different items – loot bag items, party novelties and supplies. It's very rare that someone isn't satisfied with the quantity that we have," he adds.

For bar and bat mitzvah give-aways, the store carries many inflatables such as microphones, guitars, disco glasses, Mardi Gras beads, glowing and flashing jewelry, hats, sunglasses, glittery wigs and more.

Party Packagers sells party favours like clocks, diaries and other "tween" items for young girls and sports gear such as basketballs and soccer balls for boys, Mandel says.

The give-aways start at 25 cents a piece with flashing products ranging from 50 cents to $2, he adds.

"The most popular items are the glow necklaces and they sell for four for a dollar or you can buy a package of 50 for $29.99.

"Everything we sell is competitively priced. We're known for value pricing. People love our selection – our balloon selection is amazing – and they know they're buying at the best price possible."

Mandel says other prizes include packaged candy and noise makers.

"We have air horns that blow out confetti that people go wild with at the parties. We also have a giant candy department for candy tables or give-aways."

He also suggests that parents buy extra sweat socks to give out to the girls because it's the latest trend.

"They wear sweat socks to enhance their dancing," he says.

Two of the nine Party Packagers stores are located at 1225 Finch Ave. W. (416-631-7688) and 770 Lawrence Ave. W. (416-785-4035).

Face your fears by hugging a Fraidy Cat

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

As her mother grew weaker and weaker with breast cancer ravaging her body, Tammy Heisel thought of different ways to keep busy while remaining by her bedside.

That's when the Fraidy Cat was born.

Heisel made her mother a hand-sewn, custom-made stuffed cat, roughly the size of a puppy, which seemed to comfort her.

"It's the perfect size because when you hug it, it kind of hugs you back," said the Toronto native, who now lives in Rochester, N.Y.

Nearly six years later, Heisel wanted to do something for children who suffer from terminal illnesses, and it dawned on her that the cat she made for her mother would make the perfect toy.

By December 2004, she had donated 12 Fraidy Cats to the CURE Childhood Cancer Association.

The idea behind the stuffed felines is that it's natural for anyone with a terminal illness to fear what lies ahead. With each cat, a person receives a poem that encourages them to face their fears and be in touch with their emotions.

"At the very least, they would have a new 'friend' that they could hug and hold when they were feeling afraid," Heisel wrote on her website.

"The kids loved them, so I decided to do some for Gilda's Club, where I volunteered," Heisel said, referring to the network of support groups for cancer survivors or fighters named after Saturday Night Live comedian Gilda Radner, who died of cancer in 1989.

While Heisel said the Fraidy Cats were inspired by her late mother and were meant to be a comfort to people coping with terminal illnesses, she hopes to expand her business by selling the cats as centrepieces for bar and bat mitzvahs.

The cats can be made to match the décor of a party, and afterward they can be donated to the bar or bat mizvah celebrant's cause of choice.

With the money Heisel makes on these kinds of orders, she will buy more fabric to make more toys and give them to those who need them.

To date, she has made about 70 cats – each one taking her about 1½ hours to complete.

"Hopefully, I'll be able to sell more and donate more."

What inspires her to keep going is the reactions she gets from those who take comfort in the cat.

"Someone gave a Fraidy Cat to a girl as a gift. She had some pain in her arm and she was able to relieve some of the pain by tucking the cat under her arm," she said.

Heisel told another story about a woman who was going through chemotherapy and would get headaches. The woman would put the cat behind her head to relieve her pain.

"I've had such good reactions. Everyone is very thankful. I've even gotten thank-you notes."

Others are so encouraging of her goals that they're willing to do anything to help.

One patient was inspired to come volunteer at Gilda's Club after her treatment.

"Other people have donated their old sewing machines, but I wouldn't know how to use it anyway," she said with a laugh.

Variety of flowers and ferns is mind-boggling

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

There are many components to a memorable wedding, but few compete with the image of lush foliage gracing the room or with its soothing fragrance entrancing guests as they enter the room.

The variety of flowers and ferns – both in terms of types, colours and arrangements – is mind-boggling, and the possibilities are endless. So are the vases you can put them in. Whether they're tall, squat or square comes down to personal taste. The only limit is imagination. (Okay, we'll be honest, budget has its own limitations too, but that's another story.)

"Flowers are so individual," says florist Monika Sumra of Desert Rose (905-709-0408). "It's not like you're buying bread."

Thanks to our global village, the notion that brides and grooms are only restricted to flowers in season here is quickly disappearing, says Renee Birnbaum of An Affair To Remember (905-881-6686). Florists can now get flowers from all over the planet. Desert Rose imports its wares from Israel, Ecuador, Thailand and Italy, to name a few.

But thanks to the fluctuating temperatures, flowers that are usually plentiful in one season can be scarce if Mother Nature doesn't co-operate. "If it's cold in Ecuador, it's hard to get roses," says Birnbaum. This year, a local cold spell means that the peony harvest is late, and the May shipment will be pushed back to June. Specialty flowers, such as calla lilies and lily of the valley, are particularly susceptible to changes in weather.

Because of weather fluctuations, Birnbaum won't confirm what species of flowers she'll be using until a few weeks beforehand. However, she can almost always guarantee colours.

Both florists have noticed that bright colours such as oranges and pinks are popular combinations for weddings this year. "They look stunning together," says Sumra, reinforcing the view that there are no rules when it comes to assembling a jaw-dropping floral arrangement.

For maximum floral impact, consider vases and linens, both of which are rented for the evening. There are different advantages to having tall or squat vases.

Tall vases allow for an unobstructed view. They also work well if the room has a high ceiling. "They have a big impact, a wow factor," says Birnbaum. Tall vases can be filled with gels, flowers or twigs for visual excitement.

Short vases, on the other hand, won't fill the room the same way and don't have the same visual impact – often guests won't see the arrangements until they're sitting down – but they can make a room feel less crowded. Short vases also cost less to rent.

FotoArt Books offers you the ability to preserve your memories for ever.

Turn your special memories into a work of art

By JEN THOMPSON
Special to The CJN

Looking for the perfect way to preserve the memories of your special day? A FotoArtBook may be just what you need.

Caryn Silverstein, photographer and creator of the books, provides her clients with albums reminiscent of yearbooks, which are creative alternatives to traditional photo albums.

Having been a photographer for over 25 years, Silverstein realized there was a need for a product that exploited the technology of the digital marketplace. With the knowledge of how to artistically manipulate photographs using the latest in technology, FotoArtBooks soon evolved as the perfect match for this market.

While a photo album cannot capture the whole story behind your event, a FotoArtBook gives you the opportunity to combine photography and memorabilia such as copies of speeches, memorable quotes, invitations, sentiments and anything else that is special to you.

To ensure that each project is custom-made for each client, Silverstein doesn't use templates when creating a personalized book.

Working with her co-designer, Monica Draper, she creates a one-of-a-kind work of art for you to display in your home. Covers are woven and bound for a personalized touch and finished with a linen or leather-embossed spine.

Creating a FotoArtBook is easy. Clients begin with a consultation with Silverstein. Concepts and themes are discussed and pictures and memorabilia are collected. Once your digital art book is created, she posts your FotoArtBook online for you and your family to view and approve. Any changes are done online, and the customer is provided with a personal website to view the album free of charge.

Once the online book is created, your FotoArtBook is bound, printed and delivered to you within 6 to 8 weeks.

Professional photographers can also benefit greatly from this product. Silverstein sells each book at a wholesale price to photographers who may then resell the books to their clients after filling the pages with photos from their event.

There are many uses for FotoArtBooks. Not limited to designing albums for weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, Silverstein can create a book that captures memories from important events such as travels, engagements, family reunions and any other milestone you wish to remember.

Silverstein also sells signing books for bar and bat mitzvahs that can replace the traditional signing board or guest book. Customers can choose from an online template and supply photos of their children from birth to age 13. The pictures will then be placed on each page of the hardcover, linen-stitched and bound signing book.

FotoArtBooks are truly unique and offer ways to both express your creativity and to combine old memories with new ones.

Your special event may only last a day, but FotoArtBooks now offers you the ability to preserve your memories for a lifetime.

Meet at the Fun Station for outdoor parties

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Outdoor activity combines with family fun at the Fun Station, a park and arcade that offers activities for all ages and members of the family.

Proprietors Doug and Michele Upton have been running the park for five years. Located at 5 York Gate Blvd. near Jane Street and Finch Avenue, it sits on a well-kept, mature site with beautiful trees and is easily accessible from anywhere in the city.

Two delightfully landscaped 18-hole championship miniature golf courses add to the effect and the fun.

"It's family-oriented and warm," Michele says. "It's not overly big so you don't know where everyone is and you get lost. And miniature golf is fun for all ages."

For thrill seekers, there's go-carting on a Grand Prix-style track that offers speed and tight turns for older children and adults, and there's a 1/4-mile track for people between 38 and 54 inches in height.

"We cater to people from ages three years and up," Michele adds, noting that go-carts even come in two sizes to accommodate little and not-so-little bodies.

The Fun Station has hosted corporate events, summer camps and day-care centres and the park can accommodate up to 250 people at a time. It offers a great opportunity to play at your own pace, pause for a break and some refreshments at picnic tables, and return to one of its many varied activities.

The outdoor venue is an ideal party location in the summer months.

Michele says that when booking a party, clients also book a rain date. If a party must be cancelled due to inclement weather, she adds, "you wouldn't lose any money with us because we don't take a deposit."

The Fun Station also has three batting cages – one slow-pitch, and two hardball – and it's 3,000-square-foot arcade offers air hockey, foosball, boxing and pinball, among other games.

"Whatever you want to do, it's pay as you go. You can do as much or as little as you like," Michele said.

A bar or bat mitzvah and graduation are two of the most important days in a child's life. On these special days, or any other day like it, you want to make sure that your children look as great as they feel.

Attaining the perfect look is actually a lot easier than you think – provided you know where to shop.

Zero 20 Children's Boutique, at 7700 Pine Valley Dr. in Woodbridge (905-851-6041), carries dressy children's wear for people between the ages "zero to 20," as the name suggests. The store sells European clothing lines such as Diesel, Jean Bourget and Clayeux at affordable prices.

"We provide fashionable and different clothing appropriate for different occasions... even if it's just for visiting grandma," says Santina Mariani who founded the store with her sister more than 20 years ago.

Le Club offers clothing for bar mitzvah boys.

With a variety of sizes, colours, and styles for all children, Zero 20 is a one-stop-shopping experience.

"Everyone who visits the store remarks on the incredible selection available in one location," according to the website.

But Mariani says it's not easy upholding that reputation.

"It's getting harder and harder to find a good selection of fancy clothes," she says.

This season, boy's polo shirts in any colour are the hottest trend.

"The stylish GQ look is really great for kids," Mariani says with a laugh. For girls, breezy, flowing skirts for summer are the hottest items.

"I think people really want to stand out again," she says.

At Zero 20, they really understand the importance of looking your best.

"A compliment for children is a compliment for their mothers," says Mariani. "You put your children first and you always want them to look good."

As well as their wide variety of name brands and styles, Zero 20 is known for their incredible service. They always make sure the customers get what they want and even have a seamstress available for alterations to ensure the clothes fit perfectly.

Whatever the occasion, you can be sure that Zero 20 will have just what you are looking for.

To offer their clothing at even more affordable prices, Zero 20 has recently opened an outlet at Bathurst and Lawrence (416-532-4459).

When it comes time for your son's bar mitzvah or graduation, you need to look no further than Le Club (416-488-7848) at 424 Eglinton Ave. W.

Le Club, which specializes in school uniforms, started carrying mens-wear, but now caters to a younger clientele and offers clothing for bar mitzvah-aged boys as well.

Le Club offers a more selective variety of clothing that serves as a place where father and son can both find what they're looking for, and people are very receptive to this kind of convenience.

"The response is extremely appreciative," says Nadia Serraf, the store's owner. "Everyone knows each other, and we have everything on record so that it is easier for the customer. Our service is different than other typical stores. We really have a soul at our core."

Le Club also offers wardrobe consultations for their clients.

"I can help with anything from dressy to casual, from elegant to funky," says Serraf.

Her staff is trained to do so as well. "We all know how to make clothes more versatile," she says.

Serraf and her staff listen to the needs of the customer to help them get the most wear out of the clothes. They can suggest ways to match new clothes with items you already own.

Whatever the occasion, your children should always look smashing. And with stores like Zero 20 and Le Club available, there is no reason why they shouldn't.

To insure that your children look their best on their most special days, shop where you can receive the best quality and service – these two stores have got it all.

Flowers are nature's gift to us

Birnbaum says that standard linens provided by the hall or caterer usually don't reach the ground. Many clients opt for coloured or patterned tablecloths because they add more life to the room. When you're considering flower colours, it's important to keep in mind the colour of the linens. If you've chosen a brightly coloured tablecloth, it might look better to go for white or cream-coloured flowers, and vice versa.

Both florists agree that the most important thing to keep in mind when ordering flowers for a simchah is budget. "You'll be wasting your time if you're just going to get an idea of prices," says Sumra. Prices vary wildly. Before you go, plan how much you can afford to spend on flowers. Consider the whole event, and cut corners where nobody will notice, she suggests.

Flowers must be ordered six weeks in advance and delivered two to three days before the simchah. After receiving the shipment, the florist will put the flowers in several solutions to preserve longevity and store them in a cooler. If your flowers don't last more than a week after your big party, you're buying from the wrong place, says Sumra.

However, the bottom line is that it's important to remember that flowers, like all other parts of nature, are not guaranteed.

"Flowers are nature's gift to us," Sumra says.

Turn off your cellphone and unwind at a spa

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Imagine a place free of cellphones, free of nagging messages and spam e-mail – doesn't seem too possible does it? With the help of two of the city's best spas, you can get to that place – even if it's just for a little while. Whether you are stressed from planning an upcoming event or just need some serious R&R, a spa is the perfect place to spend your day off.

Stillwater Spa, which is located at Toronto's Park Hyatt Hotel (416-925-1234), is the perfect embodiment of serenity and calm. From the moment you step inside this luxurious space, the sights and sounds of waterfalls greet you. The walls are free of clocks and cellphones disappear. "The spa is a sanctuary where you can come in and leave everything behind," says Paul Semkuley, the spa's director.

Stillwater Spa is just one of 35 Hyatt spas worldwide. With new branches opening in Scottsdale and South Beach, Hyatt is arguably a leading force in spa operations.

Toronto's Stillwater is located in the heart of downtown Toronto. It has a certain urban charm that resort environments do not. "We all try to have something that is indigenous to the area", says Semkuley. "In an urban environment, people really want to unwind. We create that sense of calm for you".

The spa offers a myriad of services that all promise to clear your mind. It offers an atmosphere in which you do not feel rushed, pressured or nervous. Stillwater's staff is there to pamper and take care of you.

When you enter the spa, the staff guides you, letting you know about all of the amenities that are there for you. You are pampered even while waiting between appointments, with flat screen TVs and private rooms at the ready.

Stillwater Spa promises a completely relaxing experience. Whether it is to get rid of pre-wedding jitters or just for a day of peace and quiet, the spa is the sure to rejuvenate you.

Another place that is sure to pamper you is Featuring…You Spa and Salon (416-783-7793). The spa's philosophy is evident in its name. "Featuring…You" will do just that. "We take care of you from the top of your head to the tip of your toes," says Mary Orlando, the spa's owner.

What began as a small makeup consultation service 20 years ago, has grown into a full-service spa and salon. Featuring…You offers everything from manicures and pedicures to botox and waxing. As well, Featuring…You has expanded to offering makeup services for Canada's Bridal Show. Featuring…You provides various special services in its beautiful interior.

"The most popular service at the spa is the crystal peel, a microderm abrasion facial," says Orlando. The crystal peel deeply exfoliates skin, stimulating movement in uneven skin.

A popular service for brides, travellers and practically anyone before the summer is airbrush tanning, which the spa has been offering for four years. Airbrushing gives an even, glowing tan all over your body. Airbrushing can even used to fill in strap or sleeve marks.

Featuring…You puts a creative spin into spa treatments with monthly themed manicures and pedicures. June is lemon meringue month, with everything from lemon sugar scrub to soaking in lemon-scented water.

As well as offering unique spa services, Featuring…You has a staff of loyal trained professionals. "Most of the staff has been here since the beginning, so that makes the clients extremely comfortable," says Orlando. Featuring…You's spa is also available for special events, and can customize their services for all your event-planning needs.

When all you really want is to be treated to a little attention, the spa is the only place to go. Leave your problems at the door; once you step into Featuring…You, the outside world can wait! Be prepared to be spoiled in every way, from a relaxing massage to having your nails painted. Once pampered and cared for, you'll be ready to take whatever is thrown on your plate.

Everyone can create a memorable speech – with a little help

By JEN THOMPSON
Special to The CJN

Does the thought of having to deliver a speech in front of your friends, family or co-workers send you into a panic?

For many of us, having to give a speech is a painful experience. Most people want to deliver humor and articulate sentiments in a speech but are unable to find the right words.

Hiring a speechwriter may be the key to delivering a speech that will not only be remembered but will also be one of the highlights of your simchah.

Esther Turner

Esther Turner, who writes speeches for many events, says she started her company, Your Word's-Worth (905-508-7035), 10 years ago, out of a growing need in the marketplace.

Turner has a background in drama and she was often asked to put her creative writing skills to work, writing speeches for friends. Turning her talent into a business was a logical step for her.

A lot of time at an event is spent either listening to or delivering a speech. Speeches can create memorable moments, some good and some bad – the uncle who wouldn't finish his speech or the aunt who sparked the laughter in the room.

Your Word'sWorth will help you to create a perfect speech for any occasion.

Turner has written speeches for corporate functions, tribute dinners, weddings, bar mitzvahs, bat mitzvahs and more, and she can captivate an audience with her words.

She says, "It doesn't matter if you are ghost-writing for a bar mitzvah boy or the CEO of a major corporation – you have to be a student of people in order to be able to channel their persona through your words and make it believable and entertaining for the audience.

"I consider my ability to connect with people a gift, and it's beyond rewarding to get a call from a client following their event and having them tell me that the speeches were the best part of the evening."

Clients begin by having a free consultation with Turner. She prefers to meet with them on their own turf. It is there that she can better get a sense of their personalities.

She says that you should come away from a meeting with a speechwriter knowing that you will get an original piece of creative work that is tailor-made to suit you.

She adds that if you have the personality of Billy Bob Thorton, don't try to deliver a speech made for Billy Crystal. If your friends know you to be the life of the party, don't decide to deliver a sappy poem because you feel compelled to conjure up sweet sentiments.

Turner says that everyone has within them the ability to create a great speech. However, the pressure of having to stand before a group of your closest friends and family and somehow convey what's in your heart on the most emotionally charged of days is no small task. The best way to deal with your anxiety is to be prepared.

A speechwriter should spend time getting to know you in order to give you a suitable speech to deliver. Turner says that if you decide to hire someone to help you write a speech, you should do that when the invitations are sent out. This will give both you and Turner enough time to create a unique, polished piece of work.

Your Word'sWorth also offers packages for events, including customized speeches for each segment of the evening.

Considering that so much time is spent on speeches at an event, preparing them should be as important as choosing the flowers and the music. Your Word'sWorth can ensure that your speeches enhance and enliven your event, creating memories that last a lifetime.

Travel Network plans trips that are out of this world

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Planning the perfect honeymoon can be done with the click of a mouse, but many newlyweds want more than the standard all-inclusive vacation package.

The Travel Network is one agency that can help honeymooners find something special.

"Whatever you dream we can bring to fruition," says Carol Segal, a 19-year veteran at the Travel Network.

With contacts all around the world the company can not only book a couple into a hotel, but can create the perfect evening, something that most standard travel agents don't do.

"We can take a plain all-inclusive and add little things to it that make it special," Segal says. "For example, if you book something in a hotel, I can make arrangements for dinner in a private dining room in a particular hotel or restaurant for your anniversary, or for your honeymoon. I can have things organized so [an engagement] ring is brought out on a platter – anything to make your holiday special."

For one adventurous couple travelling in Barbados, dinner in a restaurant wasn't enough. They wanted to eat on the beach.

"Dinner on the beach in Barbados was an interesting experience. We contacted a hotel that is obviously very high-end and arranged for them to have their chef prepare a dinner, get the waiter to bring it and set it out on the beach and be there to serve. Whatever they wanted was prepared and then cleaned up as if it never happened," she says.

Segal says that places like Mexico, Jamaica and St. Lucia are always sought after locations, but, she adds "those are more run-of-the-mill."

She is quick to point out some of the quirkier places her clients chose to honeymoon.

"We've had people who did an African safari for their honeymoon. That was a lot of work."

Another exotic honeymoon adventure that was difficult to plan was a Tahitian cruise.

"We did a Radisson Seven Seas Cruise... to Tahiti and the couple wanted to stay on. They stayed at a water bungalow and dinner was served on their little balcony with a net tent over them. That was a very nice one."

Having a romantic dinner on your exotic balcony is something not everyone gets to enjoy, mostly because couples don't know how to make it happen. Segal says many people come to her without any idea where they want to go or what they want to do.

"'Take me somewhere wonderful,' that's a common request," she says. "I need to find out how much they want to spend and what it is they want and I try to do whatever they want. Often times people want something they can't afford, so we try and give them the next best thing and that's all based on a conversation I would have with the client."

One recent conversation with a clueless couple ended with the newlyweds having his and her massages in St. Lucia.

"I do spas and I just had a honeymoon couple come back from a place called Le Sport in St. Lucia. They wanted something more than just the regular all-inclusive and this place had spa services. They had massages for a husband and wife at the same time."

While the Travel Network can book vacations for people on a budget, planning a personalized honeymoon is usually more expensive than backpacking through Europe.

"Prices depend on what time of year you go," Segal says. "[The Tahitian cruise] ended up being, with everything included, about $10,000 US. How long you stay, the cruise line you choose, the airline you fly on – it's all factored in."

Fortunately, because the Travel Network is well-connected – they have 39 agents who've been all over the world, as well as a wholesale division – they can get the consumer the best prices.

Even with cheap airfares and connected travel agents, things can go wrong. Having a glitch in the plans of a honeymoon can really kill the mood. Segal says that her relationship with the client doesn't end when the couple leaves the tarmac.

"Once we sell a package, that's not the end of it. There's stuff that happens afterwards."

One typical problem is a couple arriving at a hotel and their room has been given to someone else – a practice called bumping.

"This often happens during peak seasons. The tour operators are unfortunately notorious for overselling and bumping.

"People have arrived at their destination and the tour company we bought it with sold a room they didn't really have and the clients are there and they're put in another hotel," she says.

Windsor Arms and Royal Kosher Catering offer quality kosher cuisine

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

With food more than anything else, the proof of the pudding literally is in the eating, and good food is essential to the success of a party.

George Friedmann is president and owner of the Windsor Arms Hotel (416-971-9666; www.windsorarmshotel.com), and he's also the owner of Royal Kosher Catering, the caterer at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre.

The Windsor Arms, a Toronto landmark, is one of the city's oldest and most famous hotels. It has its own in-house kosher kitchen, and Royal Kosher Catering, a separate company operating out of the Sephardic Kehilla Centre and the Village Shul, draws on the Windsor Arms' expertise, experience and style.

Royal Kosher also caters off-site in locations ranging from private homes to Roy Thompson Hall, for numbers ranging from 10 to 2,000. It caters every type of event, from sit-down dinners to cocktail parties.

"For generations, kosher catering in Toronto has had a bad rap," Friedmann says. "People just accepted the idea that kosher cooking was not top quality. Now, kosher can be as good as non-kosher – or better from the meat perspective, since kosher cooking uses only the healthiest parts of the animal.

"For some time, the standard has been rising. Now, people have to put up or get out of the business," he says.

"Caterers used to have cooks in the kitchen, not chefs," Friedmann adds. "Now, kosher trainees are learning to be chefs."

Friedmann attributes that former state of affairs to a lack of competition. For decades, people were forced to use the caterer at their shul. Today, he says, people see fine kosher cuisine provided by hotel caterers and they expect better from their shul.

In the old days, Friedmann recalls, people who kept kosher would often bring a caterer from their shul into a hotel, and if the food at an event wasn't great, it affected the hotel's reputation. Even though the hotel wasn't doing the catering, guests tended to associate the food with the locale.

So, to raise quality, hotels brought in their own kosher catering. This preserved the hotels' reputations, enabled them to compete with synagogue caterers, and encouraged competitors to improve the quality of their kosher food, he says.

Friedmann has observed another positive spin-off from all of this: the rise in catering quality has encouraged more people to keep kosher at their simchahs.

As well, the expectations clients have about their caterers are higher than they used to be.

"When someone organizes an event, they focus on two things: quality and price," Friedmann says. "And if you do 99 things out of 100 right, and one thing wrong, people remember the one wrong thing."

Accordingly, Friedmann has a number of policies to ensure that hosts won't be disappointed.

First, he insists on the highest quality in staff, equipment, ingredients and work standards.

Second, for every function, there's a tasting: you are served the exact menu that will be served at your event. This way, you know exactly what to expect when the big day comes.

Third, the kitchen staff and staff at all functions are professionals in their fields, with everything to lose from giving less than their best. By contrast, Friedmann says he has observed that when an owner is also a cook, he or she may try to cut corners in ways that detract from quality.

He also notes that while some people dine out regularly, some people do so almost exclusively at simchahs. Friedmann is especially keen to give such diners something special in service and presentation.

As well, Friedmann has noticed that everyone, not only kids, takes pleasure in a good dessert, so he makes sure desserts and sweets are given as much care in preparation and service as main courses.

The Windsor Arms has three venues. The Courtyard Café,which can host about 270 guests for a sit-down dinner, or 600 for cocktails; Club 22, 120 seated or 250 for cocktails; and the Tea Room, 50 seated or 120 for cocktails.

The Sephardic Kehilla Centre can host up to 650 seated guests, or more than 1,000 for cocktails; and the Village Shul can host up to 200 seated guests. Both the Windsor Arms and the Kehila Centre also have outdoor space.

A good event planner can think on their feet

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Question: What do event planners and vitamin B have in common?

Answer: They both help in reducing stress.

Event planner Heidi Gruenspan (905-738-5030) has been doing just that for many families, on many different occasions, and loving every minute of it. "It's a huge part of my life. It's people that I've bonded with over the years," says Gruenspan.

She jokes that many families have hired her for all their children's weddings, and when it comes time for the last child to be married, the parents have said to her that she should sit with them for the mazinka.

Her famous 'Mary Poppins' bag

Gruenspan has a quiet, calm manner, and is ultra-organized. Clients are supplied with a calendar, indispensable for keeping track of crucial dates. She arrives at every simchah with her famous "Mary Poppins bag." It's filled with anything one could anticipate needing at the last minute: necklace extenders, backs of earrings, a needle and thread, and much more.

She is always easy to reach, and available to clients for as much or as little as they need. She will also meet with various others involved in the function, such as the florist or bandleader, if clients desire.

Gruenspan chooses vendors for her clients based on the vendors' merit, their compatibility with the client and the price. "I'm there 100 per cent for my clients, and if I can save them money along the way, that's my pleasure as well," she says. An assistant is included in her price, as she notes that four hands are better than two.

Though she takes care of details on the day of the function, such as ensuring the proper number of tables and chairs have been set up, she believes it's better to work with someone on the weeks and months before a simchah.

"If you hire someone for the day of, you don't know them and don't feel comfortable coming to them with a problem. I build a relationship with people over the months leading up to the function," says Gruenspan.

At past events, her efforts have been invaluable in a variety of ways. Once she picked up deliveries that hadn't come; another time, a bridesmaid dress with a broken zipper was skilfully sewn together.

Gruenspan is competitively priced, and offers a free consultation.

Another name known within the event planning industry as a real stress-buster is Karen Garscadden, teaming up with partner Karen Jacobs. "The Karens," as they are affectionately called, head Up and Coming Events (416-665-6100). This year, they are celebrating their chai year in business, and they are always moving forward with fresh and innovative ideas.

"I can honestly say after 18 years that there's no one we're not happy working with and vice versa. Not only do we build relationships with our clients but also with our vendors. We are not tied into one source," says Garscadden.

Known for their infectious enthusiasm, she and her associates – several event planners make up the Up and Coming team – are constantly attending international conferences, conventions, and openings, and investigating new bands and entertainers. They also organize fundraisers and corporate events, so they can draw on ideas and resources with a different focus.

Upon first meeting with a client, they've been told they ask more questions than they answer. They take the information gleaned from the client and proceed to develop an event. Says Garscadden, "We really try to personalize what that event's going to be for that client, we take the 'want to,' to make it interesting."

'Referrals are our biggest form of flattery'

Garscadden recalls she once had seven days to put together a family's bris. She has since done a second bat mitzvah for them. "People have been very tried and true to us, and we've stood the test of time. The referrals are our biggest form of flattery," she says.

Garscadden's experience enables her to guide people. A client, for instance, may think the band should play nonstop throughout the evening. After she points out that people who are dancing will find a cold meal waiting for them when they get back to their table, the client understands that the band will have to take a break for dinner. As Garscadden says, a good consultant can think on her feet.

Make choosing a gift registry fun

By JEN THOMPSON
Special to The CJN

Planning a wedding is often a stressful, time-consuming and demanding experience, but choosing your gift registry shouldn't be.

The staff at Goodman's China and Gifts, and Cayne's, The Super Housewares Store both offer superior service, value and help that makes choosing your gift registry an enjoyable experience.

Upon entry of either store, brides and grooms are presented with many different options.

Cayne's, at 112 Doncaster Ave., offers consumers a 25,000-square-foot store filled with high quality products every bride and groom needs to begin their lives together. Cayne's offers top-quality brand names at competitive prices.

The majority of couples who register at Cayne's do so to ensure their guests can buy gifts without breaking their bank account.

Having been in the business for more than 19 years, Jerry Cayne emphasizes that although his store is extremely large, their success is based upon the personal service each consumer receives when they walk through the door.

If a couple decides to register at Cayne's, they will team up with a Cayne's employee who will guide them through the process of registering easily and efficiently.

Rozie Goodman of Goodman's China and Gifts at 1136 Centre St., also prides herself on the personal service she and her staff give each customer. Goodman's is a family business that has offered competitively low pricing, variety and flexibility for more than 35 years.

Goodman's carries products from everyday home décor accessories to more formal pieces for entertaining guests, including dinnerware, figurines, collectibles, flatware and stemware. They provide a variety of product lines such as Oneida, Mikasa, Royal Doulton, Royal Worcester, Wedgwood, Heritage, Sheffield, Moorcroft, Denby, Swarovski and more.

Goodman also stresses the flexibility of her gift registry. There are numerous ways to purchase gifts for the bride and groom.

Guests can use a notification system in which they purchase a product and it will then be wrapped and delivered to the couple at a convenient time. Couples are also able to exchange gifts which will enable them to make matching sets.

Both Cayne's and Goodman's offer the convenience and flexibility of online shopping. Both stores use the latest technology to ensure your personal and payment information is kept confidential and secure.

Each store offers convenient, flexible, quality low pricing for all your gift registry needs. They provide personal, efficient service for both brides and grooms to make sure their special day is the best it can be.

Worldwide shipping is also available from both stores. Goodman's has a toll free number (1-800-665-8187) to ensure convenience for its consumers, and free delivery within the Greater Toronto Area.

For more information about Goodman's visit, www.goodmanschina.com. To get in touch with a Cayne's representative, call 905-764-1188 or visit www.cayneshousewares.com.

Helping honeymooners find someplace special

"This isn't what they wanted so they start screaming and yelling. We call our supplier to find out why and put them in the right place. Hopefully what would happen is we'd be able to get them back into the hotel they paid for. We try to sort it out and make the client happy."

One catastrophe Segal doesn't want to experience again was Jetsgo's sudden bankruptcy.

"I was here at 6:30 a.m. the day [the airline] announced [that all the flights were cancelled]," she says. "I made tentative reservations for my clients and started calling them at 7:30 in the morning and put them on other flights so they wouldn't miss their holiday. They needed to get their money back so we filled out their forms, made the phone calls, made arrangements and everybody was happy. It was a lot of work and a lot of aggravation that we don't get paid for."

Although Segal technically works five days a week, in case of emergencies, she's willing to be on call. She'll even give some of her clients her home number.

"I don't advertise my home number, but my clients are pretty important to me," she says. "We have a toll free number here (1-800-666-8747) and there is an emergency number, but most of the tour operators and hotels have toll free numbers so if there's a problem they have someone to call. And if one of us goes on holiday the other 38 agents certainly can kick in and do whatever it is."

Lasting gifts & party favours

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When we celebrate a milestone event, be it a bris, bar or bat mitzvah, graduation or marriage, we want to commemorate it with a gift. And because such a milestone marks a lasting change in someone's life, it's fitting to commemorate it with something that lasts.

Proprietor Israel (Izzy) Kaplan of Israel's Judacia (416-256-2858 or toll-free 1-800-449-5918 ext. 24; www.israelsjudaica.com) poses the following question: "When buying a gift for someone, ask yourself: is it for today, or the long term?"

Essentially, what Israel's Judaica offers you is for the long term (though they do carry items such as Israeli candy, whose quality is attested by the fact that it does not stay around long).

Here, you'll find ceremonial products for home and synagogue, from seder plates to washing cups. And they have something for every age group, from small children to great-grandparents. This includes many Israeli products, such as fine glassware.

There's a full selection of Jewish-themed audio and CDs, DVDs and software. They include Israeli popular music, cantorial singing, klezmer and a cappella Shabbat songs.

Israel's books vary in subject from religion to contemporary Israeli novels, from terrorism to Genesis and the Big Bang; and they receive regular shipments from Israel. Some Hebrew books have facing-page translations; and Artscroll offers a series of books with Hebrew, English translation and Hebrew in phonetic spelling.

Israel's Judaica does a lot of educational work. Kaplan has friendships with non-Jews interested in Jewish and Israeli culture; and he helps converts familiarize themselves with Jewish religion and culture.

Israel's Judaica also plays a big role in helping adults refresh their Jewish knowledge. "Parents whose kids are in day school want to bone up on their own Jewish education to keep up with their kids," Kaplan says, "and they buy the materials here."

Israel's also hosts Israeli and other Jewish art shows, book launches and music events. Such cultural events are important enough that they have a special person on staff to organize them.

Some regular customers come in two or three times a year, to find gifts for the holidays or life-cycle events. Others come once or twice a month, looking for things like new literature to regenerate their minds.

Israel's Judaica sells to shuls and wholesales to gift shops. They have two retail locations, one near Bathurst and Eglinton and one on Clark Avenue in Thornhill. Most of their wares are foreign-made, but in stock; and they take special orders. Also, they offer gift certificates.

Incredible Novelties (905-881-9900, www.incrediblenovelties.com) offers quite a different type of gift. Novelties are a big part of a bar or bat mitzvah; and purchasing them deserves some thought.

Partners Saul Sacks and Dan Jankelow have been DJs for years; and they've noticed that party clients tend to buy either too much of a novelty item, or too litle. "Either there isn't enough to go around," Sacks observes, "or things are wasted, left lying on the floor." Incredible Novelties solves this dilemma.

For one thing, as DJs, they know what's hot with kids, and what's not. For another, from working at different sizes of event, they can calculate needed quantities. Nobody will be left out and nothing need go to waste.

Incredible Novelties also maintains a high standard of service, making sure that you, the client, get exactly what you want. They drop the items off, so you don't have to shlep them; and the materials are "party-ready," as Sacks puts it, so you don't have to unpack them. The staff sets it up for the DJ, who hands it out. Delivery and setup are free.

The category of novelty covers favours and prizes. Favours include items such as flashing pins with LEDs, or "light-up" pins; necklaces, jewelry and buttons; game and sports items; and musical instruments. Prizes include CDs, DVDs, rock 'n' roll band T-shirts and shag hats. Incredible Novelties also stocks promotional items for business events.

By definition, though, novelties "age" quickly. To earn the "incredible" part of its name, this company continually brings in new items and updates its webite. They now do sign-in boards and menus; and they will customize novelties for you, such as place cards, table seating, life-size cutouts and banners.

Sacks and Jankelow are still DJ-ing. "It's fun," Sacks says, "and it keeps us in touch with novelty trends. We love to see people reacting to novelties, and kids winning prizes."

Incredible Novelties has a full showroom in Richmond Hill, at 55 West Beaver Creek Rd., Unit 42. They have a huge stock, and can meet short-term orders.

18 reasons to have your simcha at King Solomon's Table

1. You're number one.

Everyone in the catering industry is busy claiming to be number one.
At King Solomon's Table, we KNOW who #1 is: YOU.

2. DOUBLE CHAI. Two times 18 equals years of experience. Our staff knows how to make simchas because they've had practise.
3. TRIPLE CHAI. The number of items you can choose from in your special simcha buffet. Variety is the spice of life.
4. BEST VALUE. If you want great food, great service, and great ambience at a great price, we can confidently state that we're #2 (see #1).
5. LOCATION. With immediate access to 401 and the Allen Road, there's no more accessible spot in Toronto. Period.
6. AMPLE FREE PARKING ON SITE. If you're a marathon runner, Mazel Tov. Your guests don't need to be.
7. This is the perfect age to take young Moishe or Esther OUT for their birthday party ... to King Solomon's. It's the age at which children are old enough to wreck the furniture and know they can get away with it.
8. Moishe is now 8 and you're already starting to worry about his Bar Mitzvah. You need a break. Take the whole family to King Solomon's.
9. Now you're worried about Esther's Bat Mitzvah too? Enough already! We will now require you to sign a contract transferring all your worries to us.
10. WOW! See how good that felt?
11. More psychotherapists and lawyers hold their simchas at King Solomon's than anywhere else. Why? They love this transfer of worries contract.
12. Moishe is now 12 and you are officially in panic mode. Come to King Solomon's and strike up a conversation with every stranger you meet at the buffet table until you find a psychotherapist you're comfortable with.
13. Your children have discovered the credit card. YIKES! Have a heart to heart chat with them over dinner at King Solomon's.
14. We all want everything to be perfect, but life isn't perfect. If it was, there'd be no stories to tell.
15. The kids are begging you to let them drive the car "off the record." Time to change the subject ... over lunch at King Solomon's.
16. If you've read this far, you need a simcha ... ANY simcha. Where else but at King Solomon's?
17. Did we hear Esther mention the word "love?" Time for a "tough love" chat ... over dinner at King Solomon's, of course.
18. Good news and bad news. The bad news is, the shidduch date you've arranged for Esther is not her first choice, even though you know he's perfect for her. The good news is, they're meeting at King Solomon's.

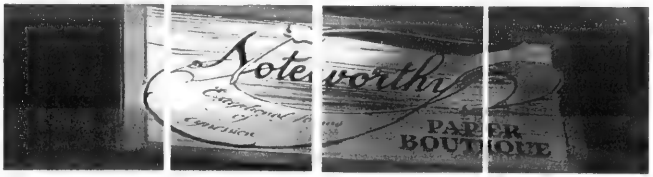
Make a good first impression with an invitation

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN



NOTEWORTHYINC.CA

Invitations to a party, whether they're for a big bash or an intimate soiree, are great fun to receive in the mail. Invitations are also the perfect way to set the tone for the fun to come and exhibit your personality, while letting your guests know what to expect.

Invitation House (416-593-0519) and Noteworthy (905-944-9066) both design custom invitations for clients who are searching for unique ways to present their events. Terry Kirshenbaum of Invitation House remembers putting together invitations for an engagement party with the details of the party printed on a cocktail napkin. He also recalls putting together invitation boxes – two feet tall by one foot wide – and hand-delivering them for a customer's 60th birthday party.

But for those not quite willing to do construction work to make a statement, who still want something creative and different, Kirshenbaum and Noteworthy owner Lori Lievonen insist that there are other ways to do it.

The paper used for an invitation can often set the mood. Japanese papers, tissues, vellum, ribbons and pockets are simpler ways to achieve an outstanding effect that convey a sense of formality, says Lievonen. Kirshenbaum usually opts for papers that are 100 per cent cotton and have serrated edges.

Creating an emblem is becoming a trend for party-planners. This is especially true at weddings, says Lievonen, where the bride and groom will make sure that every printed piece of paper – invitations, thank you cards, place cards, menus and programs – carries the same design.

As for printing, there are several different ways to get the message onto the paper. Copper plate engraving requires the text to be etched into a copper plate, as the name suggests. The plate is then pressed into the back of the paper and ink is transferred directly onto the invitation.

"It's one of the oldest and most elegant techniques," says Kirshenbaum.

Another technique for writing invitations is embossing, which means the text or image is pushed into the paper from the reverse side, often without colour. The result is an elegant, raised message, with grooves on the back of the paper.

Thermography provides a similar effect to engraving and embossing, but for a fraction of the price. First, text is printed directly onto the paper using standard printing. Powders are then sprinkled on the paper and it's placed in an oven. When the invitation is done, the text is raised, but the back of the invitation is flat.

The wording of an invitation can also be used to let guests know how formal the affair will be. The way you invite people to a splashy pool party is different from the way you would word an invitation to a formal sit-down dinner.

"The wording is very important," confirms Lievonen. The language of the invitation can also be a big clue about what to wear to the event. "If there's going to be fun and dancing, your guests need to know to wear comfortable shoes," says Lievonen.

Both Kirshenbaum and Lievonen recommend ordering invitations well in advance. Kirshenbaum suggests working backwards to figure out how early you need to start looking for invitations. It can take up to six weeks for a stationery store to produce custom-made invitations, and they should be sent out six to eight weeks in advance so guests have enough notice.

It's also important to have a budget set before you decide on a particular invitation. Custom invitations at Noteworthy start at $3 each and go up to $20. Invitation House's invitations and reply cards together start around $6, but in both cases, all prices depend on the individual design and papers. If cost is a factor, there are ways to make custom invitations more affordable. If your invitation has multiple layers, offer to do the gluing yourself and you'll save on labour costs.

Noteworthy also has an Ellison machine, which cuts different shapes out of paper. Customers can use the machine on their own and assemble the shapes at home. Three months of unlimited use of the machine costs $25.

"It's great fun," says Lievonen.

Noteworthy offers free one-hour consultations. Representatives at Invitation House will consult with customers by appointment only.

LIFESTYLE EVENTS

Immortalize loved ones with a documentary

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

If a picture is worth a thousand words, then a moving image with sound is worth that much more – at least that's what the Toronto-based company Storybook Films and their clients think.

The company makes films honouring the work, life and achievements of a parent, grandparent or colleague. The films are often used for retirement and anniversary parties, or even for baby boomers who want to capture their aging parents on film for future generations.

"It's important for people to document their life stories," says Dayle Levy, who does the marketing and advertising for Storybook Films (1-800-997-5070).

She notes that film offers something a still photograph cannot: sound. Having a loved one's voice on tape can be a soothing memory, especially if the person has since passed away.

Kellie Dearman and Dave Luetjen, the creators of Storybook Films, have been in the television business since 1989. The company started when Luetjen and Dearman were filming a series for Global TV called Second Change: Making It Work – a show about women who had overcome challenges in the past. It was then they realized they enjoyed talking to people about their lives.

Soon after, the couple noticed that many people were not taking the time to pass down family stories and histories to their children and grandchildren, and they feared family lore would be lost as elderly relatives passed on.

"Everybody has a story to tell. That's where the name came from," Levy says. "The purpose is to profile a life lived."

The beauty of filming relatives is that you can remember them with something tangible, says Luetjen. "It's family history," he says. "You can capture it forever to enjoy today, and you can pass it down."

> 'The beauty of filming relatives is that you can remember them with something tangible'

To produce a film of someone's life story, Luetjen and Dearman conduct interviews with the subject, family members and friends. Depending on the story, the duo will ask questions about the individual's childhood, marriage or work, says Luetjen.

"How did you meet your spouse?" and "Tell me about the challenges you faced while growing up," are two of the questions that Luetjen likes to use to explore the person's life. Luetjen also recommends incorporating photographs or other memorabilia with music and sound into the film.

The filming process is short – it usually takes two to three days – but editing can last up to two weeks. Within that time frame, customers have a chance to see the film and make changes before Luetjen and Dearman complete it. The finished product usually runs from 30 to 60 minutes, and is presented in the style of an A&E documentary.

The cost of an open project – a collection of unedited footage and interviews with which the customer can decide what to do – starts at $1,900. The couple offers a variety of packages and can accommodate the demands of the pickiest customer.

"We can do anything people want," he says. "The sky's the limit."

Memories of my daughter's wedding

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

I thought it would be fabulous but it was so much more. How was it possible that my baby girl, Stacey, was standing before me looking like a Princess Bride?

It seemed like yesterday that I was buying pink bonnets, frilly dresses and barrettes galore. How have the years passed so quickly? A big tip for parents of baby girls is to savour every moment because in a blink of an eye, your precious baby daughter will be marrying her love.

I was not ready for this new stage of parenting. It felt like a mixed blessing. Part of me was saying goodbye to my baby and the other part of me was filled with such pride and joy that my cup runneth over. It was an emotional time filled with lots of tears and reflection. But soon I realized that I had better dry my tears and get ready for the best time of my life. The wedding planning was about to begin.

The first meeting with my future son-in-law Jamie's family was fabulous. Of course, I wasn't surprised, as Jamie had been part of our family for more than four years and he is a true joy. I didn't realize that his parents, Jerry and Helen, along with his gorgeous sister Lauren, were going to be equally as wonderful. My former husband Sid and I were delighted, and our relationship with Jerry and Helen just kept getting better. It was all about the kids, and no one lost sight of that. With one minor exception: Jerry wanted lots of cakes for the sweet table – he loves cakes and none of us like cakes – but because we all love him so much, cakes it was.

Daughter's wedding was so much more than fabulous

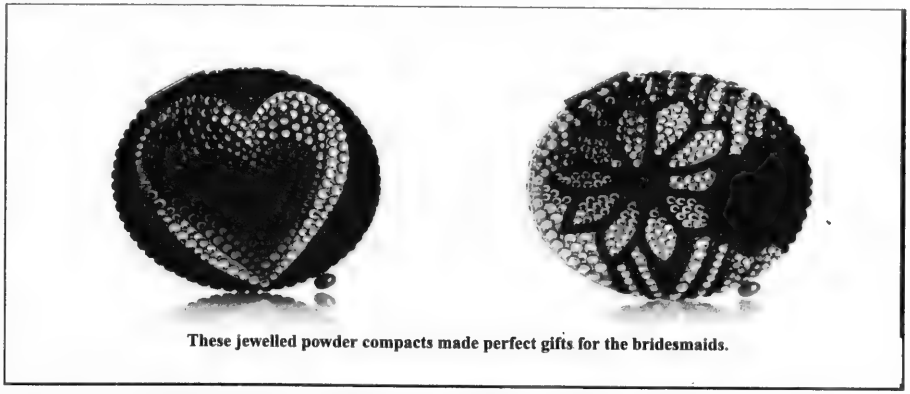
The hours spent fashion co-ordinating were well worth the effort and time. Our feet were exhausted and our heads ached as we went from shop to shop. However, that was not the hardest part. Making each decision was tricky, and the decision-making seemed endless. It was all so much fun but beware, the tears and frustration are bountiful.

Stacey and I were frazzled as we shopped, but our good luck was that Helen was there every step of the way, with love and calmness, as well as with some great ideas. We will always be grateful to her. And when we were all pooped, my dear mother, Belle, and my sister-in-law, Francine, stepped in.

The first item in the array of clothing to purchase was, of course, the gown. We were lucky to find the most exquisite Christian Dior gown that suited and fit Stacey to perfection the first time out. But no, this couldn't be the one, because it was the first gown she tried. Stacey had try on at least 40 more gowns. Eight hours and several stores later, it was decided that the Dior gown was it – hallelujah! We were all thrilled, especially me. It took a few weeks to decide on a tiara, but the wait was worth it.

Now the men, they were easy to dress, but that's not to say they didn't look elegant, sleek and sophisticated. Dressed head to toe in Hugo Boss, the dads, Jamie and the best man, my son Matthew, all looked great.

The bridesmaids' gifts were difficult to choose. We wanted something special that the girls would remember.



These jewelled powder compacts made perfect gifts for the bridesmaids.

We were lucky to find gorgeous jewelled powder compacts for them. The perfect gifts, they will be priceless mementos. The adorable flower girls were given bracelets.

Our party planner was there every step of the way. Don't even consider making a wedding without a consultant. They are worth their weight in gold, and then some. They are always there with the right answer to everything and take care of every detail, particularly on the day of the wedding.

Another unforgettable highlight was my sister-in-law's father, Harvey Tishcoff, violinist extraordinaire, who enchanted us with a medley of Fiddler on the Roof. He brought the house down.

So now I have my memories and I will cherish them forever. I am still not over being sentimental every time I think about how grand it was. A big thank-you to my daughter Stacey for her generosity, grace and sense of humour. What a glorious experience; every moment was a gift. How lucky I am!

Bais Groove specializes in Jewish content

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Having the right entertainment at a wedding is almost as important as the big day itself. From the moment the procession starts and the music welcoming guests into the reception to the actual party, some events could have up to three different acts. One group, Toronto's Bais Groove (416-486-8417), promises to not only provide music for an entire evening, but they'll sing at your brunch the next day, too.

"It's the one-stop simchah shop," says Stacy Wintre, one of the eight-person group's singers.

The band's website (www.baisgroove.com) promotes Bais Groove as the "Jewish entertainment source" and offers up the group in multiple forms, from DJ sets to all-klezmer gigs or a small jazz combo. With so much to offer, they're more of a business than a band.

"We took a look at the resources everyone in the band has and decided we can provide a lot more," says Jeremy Otto, Bais Groove's resident DJ and guitarist. "Our musical director Robert Grunwald plays in a jazz trio with two other members of the band, so we're able to offer cocktail jazz before during or after the events. He's also involved with a klezmer group, so we're able to offer jazz and klezmer and the Jewish content."

While Bais Groove play a lot of family affairs, they didn't get their start rocking bar mitzvah parties. They honed their chops through community events.

"We were put together by Michael Soberman who worked with the regional Jewish Communities of Ontario," says Wintre. "He knew that we were musicians and said, 'Hey, I need you guys to come out and do three gigs for our small-communities campaign launches,' so we put together six songs and off we went. That was September 2001. Unfortunately, that was a bad year for Israel with the rise of the second intifadah and because Israel was in crisis, Toronto was in need of Jewish content and kept calling us."

After five years and hundreds of weddings and bar mitzvahs, they still consider themselves a community band. This past Yom Ha'atzmaut saw the eight-piece band play four gigs in one day, followed by a wedding on the weekend and another community event that Sunday.

While most wedding bands offer a couple horas followed by two hours of English hits, Bais Groove specialize in providing Jewish content to their clients. Songs such as Ani Noladiti, Shir la Shalom, and A Boni Be all work their way into the group's mainly Hebrew set. While getting an English wedding band, or a bar mitzvah DJ is still the norm, Wintre feels that more and more people want to add some Jewish music to their events.

"People are not getting enough bang for their buck on a spiritual level," she says. "A lot of the time people go out and buy things like dancers and the centrepiece – a bunch of things that will take away the focus from the real thing that's going on which is a Jewish life- cycle event, which should be spiritual and heimish. People are trying to get back to the grassroots and bring meaning to these events."

Bais Groove not only put the Judaism back into the party but also makes sure the hosts get all the attention, not the band.

"Our focus is on the bar mitzvah of the kid, or the couple who are getting married," Otto says. "Having DJ'ed so many years, I really wanted to keep the focus on them. I couldn't stand it when the focus became on the entertainers."

Bais Groove honed their chops at community events.

To do that Jeremy makes sure to remind everyone why they're on the dance floor.

"I've seen DJs get up on the microphone and say, 'We're so happy to be here, I want you to come dance with us and come and see what we're doing and check out the arcade at the back of the room' and maybe at the end of the night they say, 'Oh yeah, thank you for coming out to Jordan's bar mitzvah.' From the get-go, we make sure whoever's party it is is represented all the way."

Getting a DJ or a band for your simchah is always a matter of debate. Otto feels that bar mitzvahs have been moving toward DJs, while weddings should always have a band. For Bais Groove though, it's irrelevant. Otto often DJs bar mitzvahs without the band, but typically their sets involves the full group and recorded music.

"It's the clients call about how much DJ versus how much live band, but usually the band will play two full sets with some music in between. Then I'll lick it off with a dance set after the band's finished for the night."

It seems like Bais Groove do it all, but one thing they're inexperienced with is touring. Their first tour this summer won't take them to Ontario's clubs, but to Jewish camps.

"We're going on a summer camp tour this summer," says Wintre. "We have a grant… to tour up to eight major camps sponsored by them. We're spending five days on the road touring these overnight camps with our vibrant sounds of Israel. Kids go bonkers for this music, and why not get kids in love with Israeli music?"

Little Miss success story for henna artist

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

In the days when henna – a form of temporary tattooing – was still relatively unknown to people outside of India, Melanie Markus wanted to be a dentist.

Today, the University of Western Ontario graduate is at the head of the successful Little Miss Henna Inc. (905-731-0067).

Established in 1998, the business brought, you guessed it, henna to Toronto for parties and events. Soon after, it expanded and was commissioned by Paramount Canada's Wonderland and countless other amusement parks across North America.

What began as a small endeavor has now morphed into a multi-faceted company that offers a number of services across the continent and at special occasions.

Personalizing anything from body art to crystal tattoos, Little Miss Henna offers something more than just a throwaway trinket from an event. Little Miss Henna now personalizes everything from belt buckles, to trucker hats, to flip-flops.

"We personalize everything for each person so that it's something they can actually wear and enjoy," says Markus. "I love being part of these events and knowing that the kids are going home with something that they love."

Although Little Miss Henna generally caters to a younger audience, their services are for guests of all ages.

"Sometimes I see more bubbies and zaides waiting in line than kids," Markus says with a laugh.

Markus thinks of new ideas for parties faster than you can say Little Miss Henna. While watching a little girl search for her shoes at a recent party, Markus came up with just one of her many creations, the "Ultimate Shoe Bag:" a personalized bag to keep belongings in while at a party.

In the last seven years, Markus has been working hard to ensure the best results for her clients – so much so that Little Miss Henna has veered from the original tattoo process, which takes almost an hour to dry, and smudges often. While Markus still offers henna services, she mostly concentrates on body art and airbrushing. This way, tattoos and decals can be applied freehand, allowing for more creativity and personal charm.

The perfect accessory to any party, Little Miss Henna's staff of friendly, creative artists come to any event completely equipped and ready to go. "People love that we can come in, set up and take charge," says Markus.

Whatever your event may be, Little Miss Henna will make sure your guests are having a blast.

Melanie Markus turned her little idea into a huge success.

Bar/bat mitzvah celebrants share their good times

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

With all the glitz, glamour and hype surrounding a bar/bat mitzvah, it's quite easy to forget the "mitzvah" aspect of the celebration.

Recognizing that, party planner Ricky Bessner and centrepiece designer Elaine Risen teamed up to create It's A Mitzvah (905-738-8238), a unique service that adorns tables at bar/bat mitzvah functions with centrepiece-style gift baskets filled with items for the less fortunate.

"It's a win-win situation because the people who are having the baskets placed on the table know they are doing a mitzvah and the people receiving them are just delighted," says Risen.

The baskets are colour co-ordinated with the celebration's colour scheme, she say, and are decorated with tissue paper, curling ribbons and fancy bows, to give the centrepiece effect.

Inside the baskets are a variety of essential life items, including toothbrushes, hats, scarves, gloves, shampoo and deodorant.

The items are applicable to men, women and children.

"It's universal so everybody can benefit from it," says Risen.

Following the celebration, the baskets are delivered to organizations providing to those in need, such as shelters for the homeless.

To make the mitzvah a truly first-hand form of charity, some of the bar/bat mitzvah girls/boys have assisted in delivering the baskets.

"It was a wake-up call," notes Bessner, the brainchild of the service.

"These kids walked into these shelters and said, 'Wow, these people are not as comfortable as we are and they really need these [items].'"

Bessner, who helps run Ricky Bessner and Fern Cohen Party Planning, says the idea came to her after years of seeing decadence overshadow deeds at religious celebrations.

"Bar/bat mitzvahs have become so elaborate," she says.

"So instead of it being so elaborate and pretentious, let's show them we're taking some of the money you get and you're giving it back."

Risen says she makes an average of 25 baskets per affair and welcomes input from the client as to which group receives the baskets.

"If they end up telling me what organization they would like it donated to, then I make the arrangements to have it picked up," she says.

As vital as the items are on their own, Risen opines that the principle behind the act is important, too.

"It's A Mitzvah believes in the importance of celebrating simchahs with others, remembering those less fortunate and giving from the heart," she says.

Bessner says clients fully understand that principle.

"They [recognize] the fact they are fortunate enough to have a party [means] they can give back to the less fortunate," she says.

"By sharing in your good times, you also have to give back to someone who is less lucky."

Not surprisingly, the recipients of the baskets are thankful for the charity.

"They're absolutely thrilled," says Risen.

"They are so appreciative of everything and anything they get."

Risen says she has been putting the simchah baskets on tables since November and has seen demand grow ever since.

"It's just been taking off," she says.

Since November, they've made the baskets for more than a dozen parties.

Both Bessner and Risen note the rewarding aspect of the endeavour.

"I'm so proud of it," says Bessner.

"It really gets the message across."

Risen agrees.

"I love it," she enthuses.

"I know that I'm doing such a good cause for everybody and it just makes me feel wonderful."

From music to massage, Rick Levine can help you create the perfect party

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

With his finger on the pulse of Toronto's event-planning industry, entertainer and entrepreneur Rick Levine has filled a void in planning parties, corporate meetings and charity events.

By launching his website, www.torontopartyguide.com, in 1999 Levine – with 20-plus years in the business and a reputation for paying attention to the smallest details – gave others access to the best of the best in the community: live music, décor, photography, catering and everything else you need to create the best possible function.

As Levine explains, the site has "everything needed to plan the perfect party. [It's] the only event planning site in Canada catering to bar and bat mitzvahs. It's a real good resource."

Viewing the site is free, and it contains a wealth of party ideas, from the smallest party favour to a hall accommodating thousands.

> The site has everything needed to plan the perfect party

Ten years ago, Levine partnered with event planner Lynn Cohen to establish their very popular event-planning shows. They were the first of their kind, and they continue to be the most successful in Canada. Always well attended, as many as 2,000 people come to the three events per year to learn about services offered in the community.

The next show will be Wednesday, Nov. 2, at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, from 6 to 10 p.m.

If you leave the show with good vibrations, you may be in the mood to hear Good Vibrations, Levine's band.

For more than 20 years, the band has performed at thousands of weddings in some of the finest halls in Toronto.

And business has never been better.

"Live music has made a comeback at bar and bat mitzvahs," Levine says. "People want a lively party."

His capacity to entertain is enhanced by Times Square Entertainment Group, which offers DJs, dancers and even a light show.

With Times Square, Levine can plan parties and provide the music, sound, lighting, and even the décor when needed.

This year, he orchestrated a large corporate event, with 3,000 guests in attendance, which included guest speaker Don Harron, who showed up as himself and his alter ego Charlie Farquharson.

Rick Levine

Levine's background in fine arts – he is a graduate of York University – also led him to start Custom Graphics, which specializes in digital signage, brochures and posters.

"We do a lot of work for all the synagogues," explains Levine.

Some other past clients have also included B'nai Brith Canada, the Jewish National Fund, Beit Halochem, Reena, Mount Sinai Hospital and Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Not one to rest on his laurels, Levine is also promoting a service that offers partygoers a good rest.

Relaxfx offers on-site chair massage and is a great extra for promotional events, trade shows and golf tournaments. By charging per massage, it can also make a great fundraiser. For more information, visit www.relaxfx.com.

Party venues fit for a queen – or her jester

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

When planning a party – whether it's a wedding, bar mitzvah or a small birthday celebration – there are two main options to choose from: extravagant and elegant, or cool and casual.

To make an informed decision about what kind of party to plan, it's important to carefully consider each avenue.

If you decide to throw a glamorous affair, the Liberty Grand offers amenities fit for celebrities.

Built in 1926, the heritage building on the western edge of the CNE grounds hosts about 400 events a year.

With its 27-foot wooden ceilings, crystal chandeliers, marble-floored foyers and a five-tiered fountain in the courtyard, a client would be hard-pressed to find a more luxurious venue in Toronto.

The Liberty Grand, above, and one of its function rooms.

Aside from weddings and bar mitzvahs, the Liberty Grand hosts the annual opening gala of the Toronto International Film Festival for 5,000 people, as well as the Molson Indy Black Tie Gala. It has also hosted actors Sandra Bullock, Penelope Cruz, Paul Newman and Warren Beatty, and hockey heroes Wayne Gretzky and Darryl Sittler.

Marketing director Darren Bryant said the Liberty Grand is unique, and it offers something for everyone.

"There is no other building or event space in Canada like the Liberty Grand that can provide guests with multiple spaces to explore during an event. It's also designed to accommodate a multitude of room arrangements and layouts, not simply the same old setup from one event to the other."

Marcelo DeOliveira, sales and marketing manager at the Hard Rock Cafe in downtown Toronto, said he can better accommodate people who want to break away from traditional formal parties.

Whether you want to celebrate with an intimate gathering of your closest friends or plan a reception for 500 people, DeOliveira said he can offer exactly the kind of party clients want.

"We had two wedding receptions last summer. It was for people that wanted something outside the box. They didn't want the traditional banquet hall and decided on a more fun environment."

If there is one place that is a departure from the more traditional wedding experience, the Hard Rock is it.

Hard Rock Cafe offers alternative to traditional party scene

With rock 'n' roll music, televisions and memorabilia that the Cafe is famous for, this venue is ideal for a casual bash.

Last month, the Hard Rock Cafe hosted a reception for about 500 people for the Ontario March of Dimes benefit, complete with five live bands.

But, DeOliveira added, for a comfortable, relatively formal sit-down dinner, a guest list should not exceed 150 people.

Regardless of whether you want to plan a grand event, or just want a party that rocks, booking in advance is always a good idea.

Usually, if you're planning a corporate event or a big birthday party, you should book two or three months ahead of time, DeOliveira said. But if you're planning a wedding, you should give it at least six months to be able to make sure you have time to take care of all the loose ends.

Bryant said with so many events taking place at the Liberty Grand, people should book even sooner, just to be safe.

"Our most popular dates are between May and December, which always get booked quickly. Thursdays through Saturdays during this period will usually book 10 to 16 months in advance.

"Thankfully, the Liberty Grand is a multi-room, multi-use facility and we often run up to four events at one time on any given day," he said. "To guarantee your choice of date, however, the earlier clients call us, the better."

At the Hard Rock Cafe, the cost of a party varies based on the selected menu and the add-ons, such as invitations that are designed to look like concert tickets. DeOliveira said it can cost anywhere from $50 a person to $120.

Bryant said prices at the Grand are competitive with venues such as the Royal York and the King Edward hotels.

He said an event at the Grand will usually cost about $120 to $140 a person, but this includes food, bar and service, and the experience is worth the price.

"The Liberty Grand offers a complete and world-class culinary and hospitality experience for everyone," Bryant said.

In contrast, DeOliveira said he thinks the Hard Rock Cafe can offer clients something that a banquet hall can't.

"It's a casual, fun environment that you probably won't get at a banquet hall... Our room has personality, with memorabilia, video screens and plasma screens that can show whatever you want. [Guests] don't feel like they are in a box, and our service is second to none. We can create an authentic experience that rocks."

Capture unforgettable moments with party portraits

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Most people feel that a wedding or bar mitzvah is a milestone important enough to warrant hiring a professional photographer to capture those unforgettable moments.

That is, if you can manage to book one in time for your function.

According to Alex Himell of Platinum Studios (905-709-7754) and Sam Sciarrino of Horvath Photography Studio (905-707-5770), booking a photographer without a year's notice may prove to be difficult.

When it comes to knowing when to book, too soon is better than too late, says Sciarrino.

"It depends on whether the function is in high time. In June, we're going to be busy, but in January, it's less busy. You should give it anywhere from six months to a year. But we already have bookings for 2007 and 2008."

Himell suggests that people play it even safer to ensure the photographer you want will be available when you need him or her.

"Realistically, dates get booked very quickly."

For peace of mind, he says people should book as soon as they decide they want to use the service. He suggests at least a year to a year-and-a half in advance.

Most of the time, both photographers say they are commissioned to take portraits within a few days of the bar or bat mitzvah or a wedding.

Himell says on the day of the event, Platinum will send a crew of two photographers and an assistant to "fully capture the ambience of the function. That is how we get candid shots and that is how memories are created."

Sciarrino agrees that people are definitely leaning more toward capturing candid moments rather than boring poses.

As well, he says, "the trend is for portraits to be more relaxed and less stuffy."

Himell says that aside from clients wanting a collection of candid photos, he has picked up on a new trend: many are asking for custom collages.

He says that unlike the traditional portrait, the collection of photos tells more of a story.

Sciarrino says that with digital cameras, his company is able to accomplish much more in a shorter period of time. This leaves room for much more creativity.

Jian and Page Magen with their troupe of entertainers.

Magen Boys offer total entertainment

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Jian and Page Magen of Magen Boys High Energy Entertainment (905-513-6464, ext. 21; www.magenboys.com) offer good advice on what you should look for in your choice of MC and DJ.

"We're launching a new website," Page says, "and we're gonna take over the world."

The site is interactive to showcase Magen Boys' bands, DJs and dancers. Along with online demos, there is fan mail. "Whether you're a party planner or hosting your own event, you should see this.

"We handle everything from lighting to MCs," says Page. This is part of the Magen Boys' total entertainment party. But their focus is on the role of the MC, and they urge you to make sure you get the best MC you can.

The guests, he adds, see the musicians and singers as the major entertainers. But it's the MC and DJ who organize the way the music is presented.

However good the bands or artists are, the MC's role is crucial. "He has to be genuine and love his work." He has to resonate with the guests, to have a feel for what the people want to hear – and the same goes for the DJ who plays the music.

A young crowd at a high-energy event like a teen's birthday will want to hear different songs and styles than an older, laid-back crowd at a corporate or institutional event. The Magen Boys put a high value on versatility, and they will work at parties of from 20 to 500 people.

But while they do all kinds of events, they give special attention to weddings and bar or bat mitzvahs. And these are all-ages events, where the MC and DJ have to sustain an energy level that satisfies the younger set while keeping the older generations in a party mood.

An MC, Page says, needs to combine a DJ's knowledge of music with an entertainer's warmth and vitality. "The MC has to radiate energy. He has to make the room light up and make the guest of honour shine."

Jian stresses the importance of reaching out to every guest in the room. "The dancers aren't there to show off their moves, the way they would be on stage in a club – they're there to get the guests to dance. The performers are players on a team, and the captain of the team is the host who's putting on the event."

As well, according to Page, the guests of honour are the stars. "At a bar or bat mitzvah, that means the bar or bat mitzvah boy or girl. At a wedding, it's the bride and groom. The people in the room should be having the best night of their lives."

"We're devoted to our guests," Jian says. "We're very caring about our clients and we're hands-on.

"Every event is different," Jian goes on. "Every family has its own special dynamic, and a milestone event like a wedding or bar/bat mitzvah should reflect this, and be unique and special. No matter how much they spend, the clients should feel this is their grand-slam event. We lift up host and guests, and make them feel good."

So remember: the MC's and DJ's musical and entertainment knowledge is at your disposal, and they should give you all the input they can, but it's you, the host, who make the final decision about what goes and what doesn't.

For any entertainer, a wide repertory is an asset. For those working at an all-ages event, it's essential. Magen Boys' repertory ranges, as Page puts it, "from age eight to 80." That includes Big Band and swing, which are popular these days as high-energy dance music; it also includes AC/DC. Page identifies R&B, classic rock and Motown as the most requested forms of music.

At the same time, the Magen brothers have observed that the young people of today are very knowledgeable about older popular music. They listen not only to hip-hop and all the other contemporary forms, but to all the greats of the past, as far back as early Elvis.

Jian observes that at every event, there are more and more older guests. And in his view, one of the major satisfactions for older people is to experience the milestone events in their children's and grandchildren's lives. As Leon Dubinsky's song says: "We rise again in the faces of our children."

Look for entertainers who combine youthful enthusiasm and energy with experience and practical savvy. Work in related fields and arts is an asset too. For example, Page brings to his work years of theatrical experience and training as an actor.

His business is based on "100 per cent rapport," Page says. This means rapport with the host and guests – but also with the other professionals at the party such as photographers and catering staff. And it's an asset to have a good name with other party professionals, as well as prospective hosts.

"Referrals play a big role in our business," says Jian. And Magen Boys must be getting lots of good referrals: they're doing 1,000 parties this year, and are booked well beyond; so Page advises you to book as far in advance as you can.

Tasty dessert treats catered by It's an Occasion.

Celebrate your special occasion with good food

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

The culinary world is always changing as new recipes and food fads evolve. That's why it's important to look for a caterer that keeps in line with the tastes of the times, says Raizel Serebrowski, president and owner of It's an Occasion.

"We're always on the lookout for something new," says Serebrowski.

"We change our menu listings probably about four times a year and we're always adding new items."

Serebrowski notes that these days, health is on everybody's mind, which has translated into a menu that features low-fat, low-carbohydrate meals.

"Rather than a lot of grains, we're doing a lot of fresh vegetables and fruit," she says.

"Salads have always been trendy and we're always on the lookout for healthy ingredients."

For the past eight years, It's an Occasion, located in North York, Ont., has catered every type of event from dinner affairs with hundreds of people, to desert receptions at galleries, to meals for people sitting shiva.

Most clients are located in the Greater Toronto Area, but Serebrowski notes she also caters to clientele in Montreal and Kitchener, Ont.

Depending on the size and nature of the event, Serebrowski encourages clients to book with substantial leeway, but says the company can churn out cuisine quickly, if need be.

"We have people that will call us in a panic and tell us to schedule a dinner two nights from now. For us, 48 hours for a small party is not a problem," she says.

"For big events, I have people that have booked a year and a half in advance. But for the most part… my clients usually book six months in advance."

It's an Occasion is under the rabbinical supervision of COR and has a meat kitchen located at Congregation B'nai Torah on Patricia Avenue.

"At our Marlee Avenue location, we deal with dairy and pareve," Serebrowski says, adding she also provides sweet tables for other caterers in Toronto.

Food may be the bottom line when it comes to catering, but Serebrowski urges clients to seek out a provider that spices things up with good customer service.

"When you're planning a simchah, sometimes you tend to get a little bit nervous over details," she says.

"Most of my customers tell me that, for them,… the most calming effect is knowing they can call me for anything."

Consult a rabbi before buying a ketubah

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Buying a ketubah doesn't just mark the beginning of a marriage anymore, it can also kick-start a couple's art collection.

"For most people, buying their ketubah is an important, even emotional purchase," says Michael Shapiro, owner of Toronto's Ketubah Ketubah (416-963-9191, www.ketubah.com).

"In a lot of cases it's the first piece of art a couple buys together, not to mention that it's an important document, laying a foundation for their married life."

Ketubah Ketubah is one of the few places in Toronto specializing in art ketubahs. On an art ketubah, the text is often surrounded by complex designs, brilliant colours and first-rate artistry. While the ketubah has been around for 2,000 years, people only recently realized its potential as an art piece.

"For at least a century or so, up until the early 1970s, the ketubah really was not used just as an art form," says Shapiro. "You didn't really see art ketubahs. Most people who got married more than 20 years ago very likely have a perfectly kosher ketubah, but it's not a piece of art."

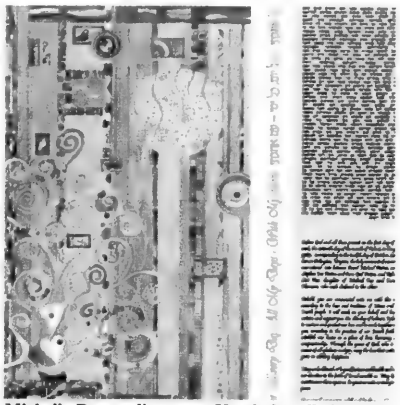
Shapiro discovered the art ketubah in Israel after leaving a job in the corporate world to attend yeshiva. While there, he had dreams of opening a Judaica gallery in Toronto, which led him to a ketubah artist.

"I started doing research about Judaica artists," he says. "As I was doing the research, I met my first ketubah artist, Ardyn Halter – he's still one of the artists who we carry. That was really my first exposure to artistic ketubahs. I didn't know much about them, but I immediately signed him up."

Shapiro then discovered the Internet in 1996, and his business was born.

Back in Ketubah Ketubah's early days, Shapiro carried only a handful of ketubahs. Now, he has more than 300 from over 50 artists.

With a ketubah as much an art piece as a marriage licence, it's easy to forget that it's still a religious document. Shapiro says there are a few things couples need to look out for before they make their purchase.



Michelle Rummel's newest Ketubah, called "All My Love," one of over 300 carried by Ketubah Ketubah.

"A very important thing to look for, which is sometimes overlooked in the beginning, is the text. It's particularly important because the rabbi or the person who's officiating at the wedding might have a strong preference or a requirement to get a ketubah with a certain text."

Shapiro says it's important to consult with a rabbi before buying or the couple may have to spend money on a new ketubah. While a rabbi would know for sure what text should be used, Shapiro doesn't mind sharing his expertise.

"The Orthodox text is a traditional text that goes back over 1,000 years," he says. "The Conservative text is almost identical but there's the addition of the section called the Lieberman clause. That's designed to protect women in case the marriage doesn't work out, and to make sure that if they decide to get divorced that the man grants her a get. Reform Ketubahs vary. In Toronto there's a Reform text, which is required by most of the Toronto Reform rabbis. That's something unique to Toronto. Elsewhere, Reform texts can vary from artist to artist."

Shapiro adds that another difference between Reform and other texts is that Reform contains modern ideas of love and support, while Conservative and Orthodox ketubahs are more religious legal documents.

While trying to find the right text might sound complicated, compared to Judaism's other religious writings, ketubah rules are trivial.

"The ketubah's interesting in contrast to say a Torah, or Megillah or mezuzah," says Shapiro. "It doesn't have to be written by a sofer. There are some rules – the handwriting should be clear, the letters shouldn't be touching each other and for traditionally Orthodox ketubahs, the signature lines are arranged in a particular fashion. But the rules are much less stringent than with the Torah or Megillah."

Fortunately, there are no rules when it comes to artwork. Shapiro says that at one time depictions of people weren't popular in Jewish art in general, so art ketubahs didn't have human designs. Now, it's all fair game.

Since ketubahs can feature anyone and anything the choice is virtually unlimited. Shapiro says it's almost certain a couple will have an art ketubah, so it's not a matter of if a couple should by one, but for how much. At Ketubah Ketubah, the marriage document starts at $150.

"There are relatively inexpensive ones on the one end and custom-made ones on the other," he says. "Most of the artists we deal with started off making custom-made and that's a far more expensive proposition. That's $1,000 and up. Our focus though is more on the high quality of limited edition prints of originals, but if custom is something someone is looking for, we'll do our best to help them."

Shapiro stresses that buying a ketubah, especially a custom one, should not be done at the last minute. Two to three months before a wedding is the best time to make the move.

"It's something that's with the couple through years and years of marriage. It's something people put up on their wall and it's a reminder of them at their best."

Unique fashions for the unique woman

This Chacok design is one of many available at Quasar Mode in Toronto.

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

With the steady increase of convenience and one-stop shopping, it's become increasingly difficult to find a unique piece of clothing. Colours are subdued, fabrics tend to be cheap and sizing has become quite uniform. But amidst the confusion of big-box stores and big malls, quality and beauty can be found. Fortunately, for the most savvy of customers, originality is still alive and well.

One of the city's most cherished treasures is Quasar Mode (416-964-1214) in Yorkville. The store, which celebrates its 26th year in business this July, specializes in importing unique French designs. The store offers a wide selection of designers such as Chacok, Zapa and Anne Fontaine.

All designers carried in the store are exclusive to Quasar Mode in Toronto. Unique in every way from shape to cut to fabric quality, the designs bring a certain freshness to Toronto's fashion scene.

Walking into Quasar Mode, one can only be pleasantly surprised by the bright colours bursting from every corner of the store. "The clothes are like a big bouquet of flowers," Quasar's owner Ginette Beauchamp says. The colours and fabrics offered at the store are scarcely offered anywhere else. "Dull colours are shunned with a passion unmatched on the Toronto fashion scene," boasts their website (www.quasarmode.com).

Although the bohemian gypsy look that fills the store can be seen in many places this season, Quasar Mode has always stayed true to the loose and fun sensibility. "We strive to be leaders of fashion, we attract so many different tastes," Beauchamp says. Everyone from TV personalities and lawyers to grandmothers and granddaughters can shop at Quasar Mode and come out with a look that is unique to each of them. "We deal with people who like to stand out in a crowd, anyone who appreciates a little bit of excitement."

Along with the desire to wear styles that are a little different from the rest, Beauchamp understands the need for practicality. "Everything in the store has a bit of an edge, while remaining sophisticated and feminine," she says. "I'd never let anyone leave the store with something that didn't suit them."

Perhaps it is the relaxed and informal atmosphere in the store that attracts customers most. "People always feel welcome here," she says.

To Beauchamp, a former singer, selling clothing is a way of entertaining the customer. "You will always hear laughter coming from our doors because my store is like an extension of my home."

Another fabulous choice for unique designs in the city is Maura Miranda Couturier (416-763-1991). As well as a couture salon, Miranda offers wardrobe-consulting services for clients.

Miranda has been in the business for 42 years and has been designing clothing since she was 13. "I didn't know any other toys," she says, laughing.

In this day and age, couture is actually a relatively extinct service. Dresses are made to order, yet even alterations are made in a sloppy manner. Couture should mean quality, workmanship and, definitely, one-of-a-kind.

Miranda is a couturier in every sense of the word. Every creation she makes, whether it is a wedding dress or fur coat, is unique.

Miranda works with her clients, choosing looks and materials to become clothing especially made for them. "What starts as a piece of fabric, becomes something else," she says. All fabrics are specially ordered and imported from only the best of manufacturers, such as Valentino and Armani in Italy.

Although her clients are involved in the creative process, Miranda says, "I'm in heaven when the customer lets me do whatever I like. I like to create unique and different things, especially for wedding parties."

Miranda rarely follows trends, unless it is at the request of the customer. "I work for people who appreciate unique things," she says.

In a Maura Miranda creation, you'll never run the risk of looking like anyone else. Since she rarely duplicates a design, you can walk out of the house feeling like the unique person you are when you wear one of her creations.

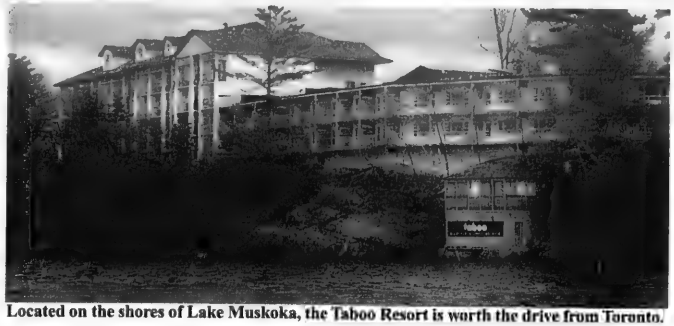
SPA LIFE
By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

The luxurious array of body and facial treatments makes it very inviting to indulge at Indulgence – a spa located in the internationally renowned Taboo Resort, Golf and Spa on the shores of Lake Muskoka in Gravenhurst, Ont.

It is worth the 90-minute drive from Toronto to Muskoka to bask in the warmth of your therapist's tender hands. Indulgence boasts up to 15 therapists, including registered massage therapists and estheticians working during high season.

The spa has six spacious treatment rooms as well as a tanning salon. The spa rooms located in the North Shore entrance of the main lodge are decorated in earth tones with wicker furnishings, and are all named after essential oils.

There is the Chamomile Room for spa manicures and pedicures, the double-sized Lavender and Jasmine rooms that overlook the resort, and the Bergamot and Sandalwood rooms. Geared toward couples or good friends is the Eucalyptus room.



Located on the shores of Lake Muskoka, the Taboo Resort is worth the drive from Toronto.

It has a lake view, a fireplace and a Jacuzzi tub, which is part of the specialized body treatments.

Every room has a private bathroom and a balcony, which is used as a place après treatment to unwind with herbal tea and a healthy snack.

The newest addition at Indulgence is the Sunset Vista by the lake.

"The Sunset Vista is a gazebo where you can book a custom-designed spa package for individuals or for two. Appointments at Sunset Vista are over a two-hour window, so that after you have your facial or body treatment, you still have time to enjoy a herbal tea in this beautiful, relaxed setting," says Christine Holloway, director of advertising, promotions and media relations for Taboo Resort, Golf and Spa.

Facials include the "facial indulgence," a Taboo-created procedure using products from Guinot Paris.

Indulgence's body treatments include a cocoa butter wrap and a white mud toning wrap, which is a clay-like product from RVB – an Italian brand-name cosmetics line.

The cranberry-maple body polish is the signature treatment that combines a maple scrub from B. Kamins Chemist – a Quebec-based company – followed by a cranberry soak in the Jacuzzi and culminating in a light massage using cranberry lotion.

Holloway says the resort area of Bala, 25 minutes from the spa, is the cranberry capital of Ontario, so it was important to incorporate cranberries into its signature treatment.

Other treatments include manicures and pedicures; waxing; makeup application and instruction; therapeutic, holistic, prenatal and hot stone massage and reflexology. Packages such as Indulge Yourself, which includes aromatherapy sea-salt scrub and a Jacuzzi soak, and Bridal Bliss, which offers a holistic massage, a Jacuzzi soak, a manicure and pedicure, are available.

Taboo also plays host to many weddings.

There are 149 accommodation units including 22 spectacular Platinum Suites, four of which are two storeys and nine of which have just been redesigned by designer Dragana. Toronto design firm Munge Leung just completed work on 79 lodge rooms. There are also 33 cottage chalets, seven hotel-owned condominiums and eight rental program condominiums.

Kosher meals are available upon advance request since they must be brought in from the outside.

The Taboo Resort is known for its 18-hole championship golf course designed by architect Ron Garl and is the home course to Masters champion Mike Weir. The Sands is the resort's nine-hole course designed by Stanley Thompson. Those who don't golf can learn how with lessons at the Golf Academy.

There are also tennis courts, a fitness centre, five pools including an indoor and kiddie pool, a marina with complimentary canoes and kayaks, and motorized boats available for rent.

Nature walks on the five groomed trails and boat cruises on Lake Muskoka are guided by Taboo's own naturalist David Hawke. For a nominal fee there's a children's program that will keep the kids busy while Mom and Dad partake in spa treatments.

To book your spa holiday at Taboo Resort, Golf and Spa, call 1-800-461-0236 or visit www.tabooresort.com.

Fun activities and clowning put smiles on faces

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Janice O'Bright of Party Extras has been operating her company for more than two years. It's a party activity company, with what O'Bright calls "incredibly creative event ideas."

For 16 years, before founding Party Extras (905-707-9919), O'Bright worked in fashion. From that experience, she learned how important it is to have fresh ideas that are well packaged and presented. That keeps her current clients happy, and makes her work interesting for her. Working with popular trends, she adapts them to offer something unique.

Doo Doo the Clown has gone international.

O'Bright likes to accommodate requests, and see everyone happy at the end of the day. "For me," she says, "customer service isn't just 100 per cent, but 1,000 per cent. Every party leads to another referral."

Party Extras does digital photos, tattoos and heat press, with special attention to digital photos and heat-press work. They're bringing out new digital photo novelties this fall. They also supply magicians, psychic readers and caricaturists. Caricatures can be templated and coloured. And everything can be themed; rock groups, for example, are popular themes for tattoos.

One of Party Extras' concepts for party entertainment is called See Your Game. They make a video of a guest taking a shot or swing in a game – golf, for example – then they freeze-frame, and compare the guest's game with either the guest of honour (say, the bar mitzvah boy) or a sports figure (say, in this case, Tiger Woods).

"For a bar or bat mitzvah," O'Bright says, "an idea has to have entertainment value. For example, it has to keep the younger set interested and occupied while the adults are enjoying their cocktails."

The people who work for O'Bright are professional, experienced and competent. The artists have to be entertainers who have patience and work well with kids, and they work as part of a team.

Party Extras produces a lot of personalized goods, including pillowcases, corkboards, T-shirts, hats and rugs. "What I bring onto the market," O'Bright says, "has to be good enough to last. People take home a rug, or corkboard, or whatever; they like to keep it and look at it."

O'Bright likes to keep things simple and hands-on. For this reason, she has a showroom, but no website. "My showroom," she says, "is beautiful. It's an ideal environment for working with a client."

Party Extras also produces food novelties. Among the best-liked are beaver tails made of soya flour, fried in soya oil and covered with dessert toppings.

For 25 years, Shane Farberman has been Doo Doo the Clown (416-226-1108, ext. 11; www.farcoentertainment.com; see Doo Doo page), bringing smiles to Canadian faces. Now, with his many engagements outside Canada, he's Doo Doo the International Clown.

His four older brothers love having a clown as a kid brother. DooDoo's three children also love what their dad does. They're aged two, six and eight; and the six- and eight-year-old often come with him to a show, sitting by the stage with the important job of watching the props. Recently, these two did five minutes of magic onstage, wearing their own tiny tuxedos.

'An idea has to have entertainment value,' O'Bright says

Farberman started his career as a teenager, as a helper to another clown. His first show was at the Bloorview Macmillan Children's Centre, for kids with serious physical disabilities. He's always done a lot of charitable work, not all of it pre-planned. He recently made a series of unscheduled visits to hospitals in Jamaica, and was a great hit with kids – and adults – there.

Doo Doo is a magical comedy clown, but he's also into dance and costumes. Currently, Farberman has 32 clowns working for him in resorts and on cruise ships. Although they're his protégés, they're not copies of him. Each has his or her own name.

What makes Doo Doo unique? His signature word is "Un-be-lievable!!" which he exclaims every few moments. He has other unique abilities, such as blowing up 100 balloons in five minutes, without a pump.

In a stage show, Doo Doo uses a lot of props. But he also loves to get families involved in his show – adults as well as kids, even bubbies and zaides – and this often means mingling with the crowd.

He gets people involved with simple things, like throwing confetti. If you're near a guy with a huge smile tossing tiny flakes of paper into the air, it's hard to stay indifferent or reserved as those flakes drift gently down around your ears.

Much of what makes Doo Doo unique is a matter of style. He projects a sunshiny humour, in a way that creates good feeling and spreads it around – or, as the company's motto says, "to put a smile on the faces of children of all ages."

Un-be-lievable! Doo-Doo can blow 100 balloons in five minutes

And he gets enough out of it that he wants to keep working forever. "I'll never stop," he vows.

Doo Doo is getting ready to head for Brandon, Manitoba, then he travels to Ottawa, Beaches Sandy Bay in Jamaica and to the city of Vaughan for Canada Day. This fall, he'll be at the Canadian National Exhibition and, from there, he heads to Western Fair in London, Ontario. Then it's back to Toronto to get ready for Chanukah parties. Talk about being booked in full!

Spice up your party with Mint Events

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Party hosts always want their affairs to be unique. Whether it's sprucing up the event with a special theme or dazzling guests with fantastic entertainment, the events company you hire is the key to bringing a party to life, says Jared Florence, co-owner of Mandell Extreme, soon to be called Mint Events.

"The biggest thing you want to look for is that the entertainment company is providing clients with what they need and not what is available," says Florence.

"We help them make their party different from most parties and that's what it comes down to. You want the guests to walk away feeling this isn't the same as the rest."

To that end, guests likely felt they'd never seen anything like a bat mitzvah Florence coordinated that transformed a country club party room into what looked like a music video set.

"We created an entire MTV theme and transformed the look of the room," Florence says.

"It was an event that was branded to exactly what the client [envisioned]."

In a landmark deal, Florence and partners Noah Cappe and Jordi Fogle are purchasing Mandell Extreme from Corey Mandell and remaking the company into Mint Events.

"Corey Mandell is passing the torch in the private events market to me… and Mandell Entertainment is going to continue on in the corporate events and hospitality markets," Florence explains.

Noah Cappe, one of the entertainers and partners in Mint Events.

"Mint is continuing to do all the events that Mandell Extreme did. The difference is… Mint Events is Canada's first boutique entertainment service… We're going to bring credibility, originality and energy to elevate our clients' experience."

Both clients and their guests have a range of preference and Florence emphasizes the need for entertainment that caters to a wide spectrum of people.

"The parties that we're doing are covering all the generations," he says.

"We're trying to make it more unique and fun for the kids and adults, [so that] everyone is dancing at the same time."

Depending on the client's wishes, Mint will provide a variety of entertainers, including everything from interactive dancers and disc jockeys to professional actors and musicians.

"A lot of our clients are looking for particular entertainers they've seen in the past," Florence says.

"If you know the entertainer you want… I would book them as far in advance as possible."

Entertainment and venue go hand in hand and Florence urges clients to ensure the entertainment company stays true to that.

Mandell passes the torch to Mint

"I'm not going to sell the client a massive lighting package that's good for a party with 250 people, when she's having a party for 75 people," he says.

"The entertainment experience we send out is catered to the venue and to the [client's] budget."

Florence says it's difficult to categorize trends in terms of party themes, since hosts are always trying to do something new. But he noted there is more involved in creating a theme than transforming the venue's décor.

"If someone has a particular theme, we'll dress the part," he says, noting his entertainers have dressed in tie-dyed shirts for a 1970s-themed affair. For the MTV event, the guys were clad in sleeveless shirts while the girls wore tank tops and cargo pants.

"We have suppliers who can [provide] customized clothing within 48 hours."

Customer service is at the core of any business and Florence says it should be a major factor for a client when selecting an entertainment company.

"It's all about customer service," he says.

"(With Mint) you have a big company thinking with small company values."

Korman and Myles hail the return of dressing up

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

If two popular Toronto clothiers had their way, everyone would be wearing suits. Fortunately for them, they're back in style.

"Business is better than ever," says Saul Korman, owner of Korry's. "People want to dress up again."

Korman says the days of "casual Fridays, casual Thursdays, and casual Mondays" is over, and the return of the suit is here.

Lou Myles hates to see people dress horribly.

"It got so casual that everybody looked like a sloppy bed. Now you watch all the politicians and what do you see? Everybody is dressing up," Korman says.

Wendy Myles, the executive vice-president of Lou Myles Disegnatore and married to the veteran designer himself, agrees.

"The trend is back to very skinny suits. I got a lot of young guys in their 20s who come to me cause they've never worn this suit. They weren't around when this happened and they love it. It's nice to have this whole influx of young guys."

Korry's and Lou Myles are two hot spots when it comes to purchasing suits. They've both in business for more than 40 years and have seen trends come and go.

And while the inclination to dress casual is waning, it's hasn't disappeared.

"Movie stars dress so horribly these days, you always see them in jeans, they look so awful," says Myles. "They think, 'Let's see how awful I can look today.' Guys who go around with their pants below their waist is disgusting and that's what most movie stars look like.

"Everybody wants to look like they just came back from summer camp, and it shows. To see guys the way they go around with shorts, hairy legs and sandals is disgusting."

Many of Myles' clients are celebrities, including basketball giant Shaquille O'Neal and George Bush Sr.

Both of these high-profile clients not only wanted a snazzy suit, they requested something extra.

"Shaquille O'Neal, when he was still with the [Los Angeles] Lakers, we made a sport jacket for him and lined it with a Lakers sweater. It was such a great idea that we also made a jacket for President Bush Sr. and we made a navy blazer lined with the American flag."

While Shaq and Bush have people shopping for them, most regular customers aren't sure what to look for in a suit.

Korman says it's important to buy something you can wear all year.

"If you start with a basic black or a navy, it takes you anywhere, to a funeral, a wedding," says Korman. "You try and buy a fabric that's 12 months a year. That's never changed. The young people want to buy the high fashion, but that's not what to buy."

Korman recommends pure wools and high performance fabrics, and not something too heavy or too light.

"Don't buy in the winter too heavy of a suit and don't buy in summer too light of a suit, but buy something that performs 12 months of the year."

Myles says consumers should know that a name brand doesn't mean a suit is top quality.

"Back in the old days, you knew what you were getting. Now you don't have any idea," says Myles. "You're paying the same for trash. In fact, you're probably paying more cause it has a bigger label behind it."

Myles says that while a name brand suit may look great, it probably won't last two trips to the cleaners.

"To pay $1,000 for a name brand suit is like paying $1,000 for a cup of coffee. This suit is not going to stand up for more than a year. It may look flashy, but I can tell you right away the suit is glued together, so it's never going to look that good. You take it the cleaner once or twice and the suit looks like dreck."

Lou Myles makes hand-made suits, something the big names don't do. While this means that Lou Myles produces less – 7,000 suits a year compared to about 10,000 a day for a name brand – Myles says Lou Myles clothing is made with more care and better materials.

Photography captures the moment

"With digital photography, we're able to do things like never before. We can create a story line with the pictures we take, and we always shoot until we get what we want," he says.

"We do a lot of work on our pictures – the sky is the limit."

Both Himell and Sciarrino realize that photography is important work and take it very seriously.

"Photography does mean a lot to people – [the pictures] are cherished forever. Reaction is always positive," Sciarrino says.

"Photography is so important – it captures memories. When you look back, you have a whole story and it represents the people and the moments that are important to you," Himell adds.

This is why it's essential, says Sciarrino, to do research and make sure you know what you're getting. He also warns that if a deal sounds too good to be true, it probably is.

"You get what you pay for. But if you know what you want, then [finding the appropriate photographer] shouldn't be a problem."

Dressing up is back in style

"There's so much work that goes into a suit, especially the amount of pressing the suit goes through while it's being made. It's pressed at so many different points," she says.

"Machine-made suits are untouched by human hands and they have about a minute and 36 seconds of pressing in a steam cabinet before it goes on the assembly line to be shipped. It's not a guy standing there with an iron, and it shows. In machine-made suits, the steam attacks the suit and the glue from the fusing starts to come away."

Korman agrees with Myles and offers an analogy to cars.

"The theory in a suit is not the fabric, it's the construction that's put into the suit. I can show you a Chevrolet with leather and a BMW with leather and the leather can be exactly the same, but when you sit on it it's not the same because the bench the leather's been made on is completely different. It's all the quality of what's put underneath it. Same with a suit: it's what's in its lining and how much handwork goes in it."

Suits aren't all the two stores sell. They also sell tuxedos.

When it comes to tuxedos, especially on the ubiquitous long tie versus bow tie debate, Korman and Myles disagree.

"It's got to be a bow tie," says Myles. "[Wearing a long tie] to me is the man saying 'I really don't want to put on a tux, so let's pretend I'm not wearing one.'"

Korman on the other hand, prefers a long tie with his tux.

"I like a pointy shirt collar, and I like a tie," he says.

The trend to wear the long tie, Korman says, comes from the film industry.

"If you watched the Academy Awards very few people were wearing bow ties. That doesn't mean you shouldn't wear one though."

After deciding what type of tie to buy, it's time to figure out what colour to wear. Myles gives a hint: invitations often say black tie.

"The odd time for a while they were doing charcoal grey tuxedos and you still have a few people that are doing navy, but black is the most appropriate. That's why they call it black tie."

The last question men often wonder about when it comes to tuxes is whether to rent or buy?

Myles says with more and more people attending charity fundraisers, tuxes are in high demand, so it should be bought.

Korman disagrees.

"If you're going to use it once every two years, then why buy? Just get a black suit and wear a black tie with it."

Simchahs: Caught on tape

By JEN THOMPSON
Special to The CJN

Choosing a good videographer for your next event is essential to document the memories of the day.

An event goes by so quickly, capturing all of the moments on video means that the milestone will be preserved for you, your family and generations to come.

Massey Bros. Films offers you an experienced, professional team who will create a personalized, unique, professionally shot and edited video masterpiece to preserve these memories.

Hart and Yale Massey have years of experience shooting events such as the Daffodil Ball in Montreal, weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs – even television commercials and tribute videos. The brothers produce custom-made, professional works of art to bring your stories and events to life.

Having made films since childhood, their film partnership began early on when Hart, the older brother and the actor in the family, used his bar mitzvah money to buy a home video camera. Since then their creativity, and passion for filmmaking has continued to grow.

Located in the Annex, the brothers have also created a reality-based television show entitled Hart of the Annex (www.hartoftheannex.com). It is this passion for filmmaking that the brothers bring to each event they shoot.

When choosing a videographer for your event, it is extremely important for you to feel confident and comfortable with your choice. The Massey brothers offer a free consultation with all their clients, are extremely flexible and work with each client to establish what kind of video they want.

Videos can be shot in a variety of different ways. A video can feature interviews and toasts from the guests or if the client wishes, it can be filmed in the style of a documentary. Clients can also view demo reels of previous work the Massey brothers have done in order to better help them with their selection.

The brothers provide a full day of coverage for your event. They provide all their own equipment including lighting and cameras. Using a DVX Panasonic camera, the newest 24-progressive frame mini DV (digital video) camera, the Massey brothers are able to make digital video look much closer to film. Once the event is shot, footage is professionally edited in their film studio, music is added, creative flair is thrown in and videos are ready in about 6 to 8 weeks. Depending on what the customer wants, packages range from $799 to $2,000.

Spring and summer tend to be the busiest seasons for Massey Bros. Films. However, they said they are extremely flexible and will do their best to accommodate your special event. Located at the corner of Dupont Street and Davenport Road in downtown Toronto, the Massey brothers take pride in offering quality, professional videography for the Jewish community. As noted by their slogan, "Simcha Videos by your brothers," Massey Bros. Films is sure to create a unique and artistic video to capture all the moments and memories of your special day.

Relive your wedding online

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

So you're having a simchah and the day has finally arrived. You've spent months planning the perfect affair. You've fretted over invitations, the venue, the entertainment, the caterer, the decorator, the videographer, the photographer and the flowers.

The list is endless. So are the sleepless nights. You've worried about what to wear and, of course, there were many shopping days until you found the right outfit.

On the big day, everything is perfect: the food, the decor and the entertainment. Even your kids are behaving themselves. Your dress is gorgeous. You're thinner than you've been in years – all that worry – and everybody's noticing. And now the party is in full swing. It's fabulous. Everybody's having a great time.

And then the party ends. It's taken a year of your life to plan and it's all over in a matter of hours.

But it need not be the end of a beautiful event. "Your party can live on… online," says Ryan Silver, the president of seemyparty.com (416-749-3895, ryan@seemyparty.com), a digital multimedia company that will capture your simchah with still shots and video clips, and have them up on your personal website within 48 hours.

In one or two days, you and your guests can relive the magic of the party – you can share the highlights while the memories are fresh – through the seemyparty.com website.

"We take professional digital photographs throughout your party and provide your guests with an immediate tool for sharing and interacting, says Silver.

"You can simply log on to seemyparty.com and view your photos 24 to 48 hours after your party ends. It's a perfect opportunity and simple way of sharing the party photos and memories with all the guests, including the out-of-towners.

"They can interact on seemyparty.com because it is an outlet for the host and guests to exchange memories of the event," Silver says. "We set up the site so it can be like a memory bank. Then it becomes an online blog where people can give their comments about the party or click onto a photo and say something.

An example of a personalized webpage.

"You can e-mail photos to friends, post your comments, view video clips, listen to sound bytes and create your own digital party place."

He says the company sends a professional digital photographer to a simchah to capture candid shots of all the action.

Silver stresses that his digital photography company is intended to complement the more traditional videography and photography services.

Business-sized cards are given out to the guests instructing them on how to visit seemyparty.com to view the photos. The card also gives guests a password to access the private party gallery.

"If you don't remember the party password, you make a written request and we will send it to your e-mail," Silver says.

After the party, a professional web team prepares the photos for the web, and a web page is coded to display all the photos within 48 hours.

Seemyparty.com is the brainchild of Silver, 27, a digital and multimedia expert who studied media information technology at the University of Western Ontario and followed that up with a graduate degree in interactive multimedia from Sheridan College. He also studied digital photography and lighting there.

This education gave him the expertise in all kinds of multimedia applications, he says. "I build and develop websites, and I can create CD-ROMs and DVDs. Essentially, we can design for any kind of digital application."

Silver came up with a marketing concept whereby "an event could become a driving force for marketing messages."

Seemyparty.com is an outgrowth of this concept, and a branch of his media company, Original-Fly Multimedia Corporation.

When he developed seemyparty.com, he tested it out at a bar mitzvah. "We did that about two years ago. The kids loved it. If you go online today, you can still see the comments."

And the response continues to be positive, he adds. "We do a party and we hear back that the service was unbelievable."

As for the cost, Silver says this party service is affordable. The introductory offer at $299, the basic package, provides a photographer for two hours of the party. Passwords, cards, additional photography time and a CD with stills and some video clips of the event can be added to the package at an additional cost. He also offers on-site photo novelties, such as framed photos and magnets, for the guests to take home.

According to Silver, the basic package is so reasonable, the cost is comparable to the trend of putting disposable cameras on the tables for guests to take their own pictures. "The results are better, more immediate and more professional, and the pictures are more accessible for family and friends.

"This is a quick and candid product to serve the immediate need of party hosts, so that they can have quick access to a record of their party."

Caribbean weddings a growing North American trend

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Imagine an outdoor wedding ceremony set on a Caribbean beach at sunset. It's the ultimate romantic backdrop.

The breathtaking vista – the sandy beach, palm trees, brilliant blue sea and orange and red-hued sky is the allure for many couples tying the knot at a tropical resort, according to the main Canadian representative for a large hotel chain in the Dominican Republic.

"The Caribbean weddings have a lot of appeal because of the beautiful beaches and the gorgeous sunsets. We get a lot of requests for sunset weddings," says Todd Kirlik, marketing director for Amhsa Marina Hotels of the Dominican Republic, the largest domestically owned hotel chain.

He notes that tropical weddings are a growing North American trend. "Many people are forgoing the large traditional receptions and opting for the more intimate affairs at resorts.

"It's also cost saving. It's a smaller and more casual function and you're combining the wedding and the honeymoon."

And while an array of wedding packages are available at many resorts throughout the Caribbean, few resorts can hold Jewish weddings.

The Dominican Republic, however, is one of the few exceptions in the Caribbean. This small Latin American nation can offer Jewish wedding packages because the country has a full-time rabbi and an active Jewish community 300 members strong.

Rabbi Oisiki Ghitis, the religious director of the Centro Israelita de la Republica Dominicana – he is based in San Domingo, the nation's capital – says he can perform wedding ceremonies anywhere in the country. He even gets requests to officiate at other Caribbean islands. "I have an upcoming wedding in Jamaica, but I'm trying to convince the family to move the event to the Dominican. It's much safer here."

The Colombian-born rabbi – he came to the Dominican Republic three years ago after spending 25 years in Israel – is looking forward to an upcoming wedding of an American physician and his fiancée, scheduled to take place in Sosua.

This quaint resort town on the country's northern coast has a unique Jewish history: it was a safe-haven for German and Austrian Jewish refugees fleeing Europe in 1940.

Some 700 Jews settled in Sosua, where they established a kibbutz style agricultural co-operative. And while only a few dozen Jews remain in Sosua today, some of the original settlement buildings have been preserved, among them, the wood-frame synagogue.

The American couple visiting Sosua were taken with the town and its unique Jewish origins, Rabbi Ghitis recalls, "They fell in love with the synagogue and they decided they had to come back to get married there."

As it happens, the synagogue and the adjacent Jewish Museum are on the grounds of Casa Marina Beach Hotel and Reef Resort– the two adjoining resorts share common facilities – owned by the Amhsa Marina Hotels and Resorts. It's "the most ideal setting for a Jewish wedding on the island because of its proximity to the Jewish museum and synagogue," says Kirlik, adding that the beach is also unusually beautiful.

"It's a spectacular private beach that has glorious sunsets. The natural reef is at one side of the beach where water continually sprays on the rock. It's very picturesque."

He says last year, the resort was the venue for a large Jewish wedding party made up of about 60 people from France.

They brought their own rabbi and mashgiach to kasher the hotel kitchen, he recounts. "The hotel staff found it all very interesting. It was out of the norm of everyday hotel life. The wedding received a lot of attention from local dignitaries. I heard it was amazing."

Rabbi Oisiki Ghitis stands outside the Jewish Museum in Sosua, a historical landmark in the centre of town. [Barbara Silverstein photo]

The hotel/resort, which typically in the Dominican is an all-inclusive (meals and alcohol are included in the cost of the hotel stay), converted one of its seven restaurants into a kosher restaurant for a week to accommodate the wedding party.

The hotel would welcome another Jewish wedding, but from a staffing and business perspective, the hotel needs a minimum of 50 people to cover some of the costs of kashering the kitchen, Kirlik says. "What we're doing is we're taking an entire restaurant option away from other guests."

Amhsa Marina Hotels and Resorts' wedding package, which is offered at its resorts across the country, starts at approximately $1,000 (US). This amount is charged in addition to the cost of hotel accommodation and flight, which vary from hotel to hotel and during the high and low seasons.

The wedding package covers legal fees ($400), and the wedding ($600), which includes a private venue, special dinner menu, wedding cake and a champagne toast for 10 people, as well as the flowers, music, decor, photos and a bridal bouquet. Extras such as live music and wedding videos can also be added.

To legalize the marriage, participants must present the following documents: passports of both parties and witnesses; original birth certificates; for widows or widowers, the death certificate of the deceased former spouse; and if a party is divorced, the original court decree of divorce. As a precautionary measure, a couple should verify the exact legal requirements long before their departure.

Kirlik points out that the most economical travelling option is to choose an all-inclusive resort and flight package.

Air Canada Vacations offers flight and hotel packages to Casa Marina Beach Hotel and Reef Resort in Sosua.

Kirlik says he would be happy to answer questions about the wedding packages. "People can contact my Toronto office and I can get the ball rolling from the hotel side, or just answer general questions about the island or hook them up with the rabbi."

He can be reached at 416-264-4756 or tkirlik@amhsamarina.com. To contact Rabbi Ghitis, call 809-533-0168 or e-mail him at chicole@ghitis.ws.

It's a weekend night and the guests are arriving at a large modern hotel for a big bar mitzvah bash.

On their way to the ballroom, the guests literally get the red carpet treatment. And as they make their way along the red runner, they are welcomed to the party by celebrity look-alikes who mingle with everybody during cocktails.

The buffet dinner in the ballroom holds even more surprises. As the doors open, the guests stop in the entrance. They are mesmerized by the decor – a re-creation of the glitter of the Las Vegas strip with a large scenic backdrop and food stations decorated as some of the Nevada city's best-known hotels.

There are large replicas of the Statue of Liberty and the Eiffel Tower to represent the New York New York Hotel and the Paris Hotel and Casino respectively. Roman pillars and statues help simulate Caesar's Palace, while Egyptian artifacts and palm trees are the props for the Luxor Hotel.

Miki Klevan, president of FOS (Freedom of Sound) Entertainment Group, says he designed the decor and concept for the Las Vegas bar mitzvah theme, through FOS Decor (905-760-0040, www.fosdecor.com), the decorating division of FOS Entertainment Group.

He recalls the traffic jam at the entrance of the ballroom for the Las Vegas bar mitzvah. "No one was moving. I went to see what was going on. People were at the door. They were shocked. They couldn't believe their eyes. The guests felt as though they had walked right onto the Las Vegas strip.

"The custom lighting, designed by FOS Productions, the custom centrepieces, the linens and chair covers – all from FOS Decor – added to the overall ambiance of the glitzy Las Vegas theme," he says.

All four divisions of the FOS Entertainment Group contributed to the Las Vegas party: In addition to FOS Decor and FOS Productions – it was responsible for the lighting and staging of the party– FOS Entertainment provided the interactive DJs, dancers and other live performers such as celebrity impersonators of Elvis, Wayne Newton and Tom Jones, while the FOS Games and Amusement division took care of the casino tables complete with the tux-clad dealers running the games.

There was no question of client satisfaction at the end of this party, says Klevan. "There were lots of hugs and kisses and the party host booked us on the spot for the next bar mitzvah."

Klevan says the convenience of the one-stop shopping that FOS Entertainment offers appeals to many people. "We found this concept was something our clients are looking for to save on time and money.

"They are busy people. They want to deal with one person and this person can help them execute their vision for all the elements of entertainment and decor."

He says the company offers an extensive selection of large props for its special events, which have included Hollywood, medieval times, jungle and underwater themes.

"Within our 10,000-square-foot facility, we have a 3,000-square-foot showroom, where clients can book an appointment to view the latest-trend decor from themed and comtemporary bar mitzvah decor to elegant floral centrepieces and stunning chupahs."

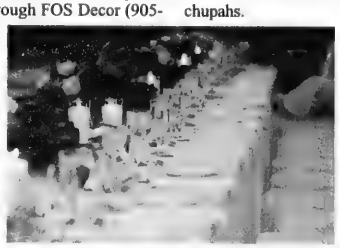
For more party decor ideas one might want to consult with Chair Decor Etc. (905-731-9217, www.chairdecor.com), a full-service rental company that has been an innovator in elegant party decor in the GTA for the last 14 years.

"We actually brought chair covers to Canada," says Jordan Rich, director of operations for Chair Decor.

"We started with a simple stretch cover in two colours – black and white – and now we have every colour imaginable."

The company has dramatically expanded its scope of services over the years. "We've grown from a single service product line to a full-rental product company," Rich says. "We rent chairs, chair covers, specialty linens, overlays, specialty napkins, napkin treatments and charger plates."

Other specialty decor treatments include draping material for mechitzahs and backdrops for the head table and custom chupahs.



Chair Decor strives to be innovative.

"We're basically a rental company," says Rich. "We work in co-operation with the decorators. We leave the flowers and centrepiece to the experts."

Chair Decor offers a variety of styles from "basic to extravagant," he says, adding that the basic tablecloth rental can be enhanced by adding overlays, napkin rings and charger plates. "We can create a visual presence that will absolutely wow the guests."

The chairs covers, which come in a variety of materials – brocades, damasks, satins and cottons – are custom designed to fit specific chairs, he says, noting that Chair Decor is familiar with chairs in most settings and can accommodate the chairs available in most GTA venues.

He stresses that Chair Decor strives to be innovative. "We're constantly on the lookout for new international decorating trends. We go to internal shows in the U.S. and Europe."

One of the newest items the company carries for elegant events is the Chiavari chair. "It has become very popular at many upscale events," Rich says. "These chairs originated at the presidential parties in the U.S."

FOS Entertainment provides convenience.

He describes the chairs as "cane backed with four spindles and squared off at the top.

"It's what they use for the award shows like the Oscars, the Emmies and the Grammies. They're used for big events because they allow you to put more chairs around the table."

Chair Decor offers the chairs in black, mahogany and gold. "We've upgraded our fine linen to co-ordinate with these more elegant style chairs," he says.

"We carry suede, satin and silk tablecloths to name just a few of the fabrics available – in a wide array of colours."

Rich notes the difference between trends in bar mitzvahs and wedding decor. "Bar mitzvah colours tend be very dramatic and very theme oriented, while weddings exude more understated elegance," he says. "The look is more classic."

Chair Decor is a family-run business that was started in 1991 by Rich's parents, Phyllis and Ben, and his aunt Mary Bien. "We all wear many different hats. We all help in many areas and we all meet with clients," says Rich.

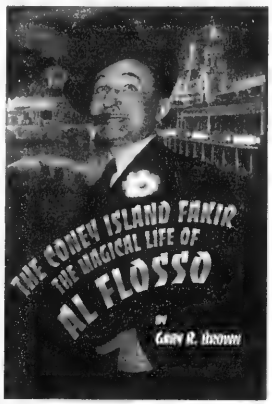
Jews have excelled as magicians

By VIC PHILLIPS
Special to The CJN

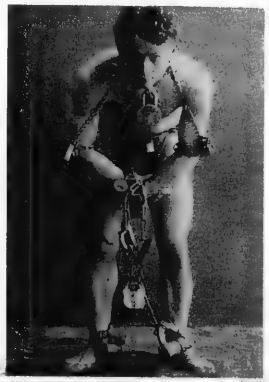
Leonard Bernstein was a great composer, Philip Roth a truly fine writer, Hank Greenberg was one of the greatest ball players ever, and we all know about Albert Einstein – Jews have become famous in the arts, science and sports. They can also be found in another field – magic.



David Kotkin is considered one of the greatest stage magicians of all time. Who is this Kotkin you ask? We all know him as David Copperfield, one of the highest paid entertainers in the world. The most "in" magician currently is David Blaine, who performs his miracles on the streets of America dressed in a T-shirt and jeans. He has astounded television viewers with his seemingly impossible feats of legerdemain, including his self-levitation in front of spectators on the sidewalk. Mr. Electric and Ricky Jay have performed in Canada and many other parts of the world for decades.

The most famous magician of all time was the Great Houdini, who was born Erich Weiss in Hungary and made his fortune in the 1920s. Houdini became famous as an escape artist. Today, some 60 years later, psychics attempt to contact Houdini's spirit on the anniversary of his death.

Judaism and magic date back hundreds of years, when the mystics exorcised evil spirits and created amulets. Even further back in time, we can ask if Moses was doing magic through God when he changed his staff into a snake. Ancient Jewish writings refer to wonder workers when discussing the Kabbalah and, of course, mystics believed astrology to be a form of magic.



Today, many young people have taken an interest in magic and are among the most eager customers of magic shops across the land. Jeff Pinsky, owner of the Browsers Den of Magic Shop in Toronto, says one reason Jews have always been attracted to magic is because it was a way to make a living when they were barred from other trades. He says discrimination forced many Jews into the outdoor markets as entertainers, where they became known for the "cups and balls" routine, believed by many to be the first sleight-of-hand trick ever performed.

Afterward it was a natural progression to using cards, coins and other objects as Jews moved from outside markets and performed in music halls and later in vaudeville shows. One family's ancestors, the Bambergs of Holland, began as magic entertainers in the 1700s, and the great-great-great-grandson Theo Bamberg took on the persona of a Chinese conjurer and became world famous as Okito.

Horace Goldin, born Hyman Goldstein in Poland in 1873, performed for royalty all over the world more than 100 years ago. His illusions made headlines wherever he appeared. During World War II, several Jewish magicians, male and female, performed for the Nazis while in Auschwitz and other death camps. Their lives were spared during the Holocaust.

Some 200 magicians are listed on the website Jews in Magic. Included is a talented performer known as Miss Blanche, who was born Ruth Iris Wachsman. She was forced to entertain the Nazis in order to save her life. She survived Auschwitz and died in the United States more than 40 years after the war ended.

There are magic tricks designed exclusively for the Jewish community. They include the "Chanukah-dabra," which involves the story of the oil that was meant to burn one day but lasted for eight days. Oil vey! The magic of Passover is also popular with youngsters and adds to the celebration of Passover seders.

In Toronto, Jews comprise 20 per cent of the 60 members of the Hat and Rabbit Club, which is Ring 17 of the International Brotherhood of Magicians organization. Some of the members perform professionally, while others volunteer at hospitals, where they entertain children, and senior citizen homes.

Since there is no real magic, new members are taught to be actors, as a magic trick is basically a short dramatic sketch. The mechanics of a trick can be explained by a salesperson at a magic store, but at a club a much more important matter is discussed: how the trick should be performed.

Magic is fun and often the only payment for magicians is the wide-eyed enchantment on the audience's faces and the wonder in their eyes as the "magic" happens right in front of them.

Vic Phillips, a Toronto writer, is the president of the Toronto Hat and Rabbit Club.

Canadian Jews to join campaign for refugees from Arab lands

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jews are joining an international effort to highlight the plight of Jewish refugees from Arab lands.

As part of a campaign that will kick off in March 2006 and involve as many as 14 international Jewish communities, Canadian Jewish Congress will reconstitute its moribund Jews from Arab lands committee and will make the pursuit of justice for north African and Middle Eastern Jews a key element for the current administration.

CEO Bernie Farber said Congress will undertake an education program that will target parliamentarians and inform the wider public about a mostly unknown international human rights issue. Congress will also push for a government statement in the House of Commons on Jewish refugees, and it is considering holding a conference in Ottawa to keep the issue alive.

"We want this on the radar screen," he said.

Farber said Congress will follow up on comments made last week by Prime Minister Paul Martin in an interview with The CJN, in which the prime minister acknowledged that as many as 850,000 Jews fled Arab or Muslim countries and that Jewish refugees claims should be taken into consideration.

"A refugee is a refugee," Martin said. "I think we've got to be prepared [to take Jewish claims] into consideration." Martin's comments created a buzz at the tail end of a conference in Paris last week that saw representatives from nine international Jewish communities discuss the advocacy campaign for the rights of Jews from Arab lands.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Victims Recalled

TORONTO — Students in Toronto and Montreal joined thousands of North American day school students studying biblical and talmudic texts on Shavuot in memory of terror victims. The project was organized by the Koby Mandell Foundation, named for a 13-year-old boy beaten to death by Palestinians in the West Bank in 2001. Participating students, who obtain sponsors for their learning, get a card with a picture and description of one of the 122 Israeli children killed in terror attacks in recent years. Proceeds go to Camp Koby, which serves kids who have lost kin in such attacks.

Cdn. Honoured At YU

NEW YORK — Ari Wainberg of Thornhill, Ont., was honoured as valedictorian of Isaac Breuer College of Hebraic Studies at Yeshiva University's 74th annual commencement exercises last month at The Theater at Madison Square Garden. He was one of 18 Canadians who graduated from Yeshiva U's undergraduate programs.

$1M Goal Reached

HAMILTON — For the second time in three years, Hamilton's UJA campaign has surpassed its $1 million goal. And although final numbers are not available, there's a chance this year's campaign could break 2003's record haul, organizers said.

CJC and Federation Praise PQ's Landry

MONTREAL — FEDERATION CJA and Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), issued a joint statement of appreciation for outgoing Parti Québécois leader Bernard Landry's efforts to connect with Jews and other minorities.

"Bernard Landry was sincere in, and respected for, his outreach efforts toward Quebec's Jewish community, and in his desire to reach out to all cultural minorities of Quebec's mosaic," said CJC-Q president Jeffrey Boro. "We hope the new [PQ] leadership… continues to hold true to these ideals."

Landry unexpectedly resigned as PQ leader and from the National Assembly at the PQ's convention earlier this month.

"He is a man of principle and conviction truly committed to his party and its cause," added federation president Sylvain Abitbol. "Through his passion and intellect he enriched the level of debate in this province and added special dynamism and energy to our democratic process."

The PQ's interim leader is Louise Harel, longtime partner of Edmond Omran, president of Medical Aid for Palestine-Canada who, as a cabinet minister, has participated in some of the organization's public events.

The newly acclaimed PQ president is Monique Richard, who while president of the Centrale des Syndicats du Quebec union, urged a province-wide boycott of Israeli products in 2002 to protest Israel's alleged repression of the Palestinians.

Seniors group turns 35

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Association of Jewish Seniors (AJS) is marking 35 years of making the community more aware of issues facing older people.

The umbrella group, with some 5,000 members, draws together individuals, seniors centres, organizations and clubs.

"Our efforts are geared to our mission: to keep all members informed of relevant issues affecting seniors, to advocate on their behalf, and to enhance the quality of life for our members and all citizens," says president Ben Goldmintz.

On social and educational issues, the group organizes monthly meetings with noted speakers such as Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber and Willowdale MPP David Zimmer, and featuring discussions on topics such as safe medication, and funding for home care.

"At our meetings, we have a good cross section of opinions and form many friendships," Goldmintz says. "With respect to religious celebrations, we have our annual second [Pesach] seder, a Sukkot lunch and a Chanukah dinner."

He adds that in the area of political activism, AJS works with organizations such as the Ontario Coalition of Senior Citizens and the Alliance of Seniors to Protect Canada's Social Programs.

"We take action on causes brought to our attention – not only those affecting Jewish seniors, but the whole community."

On June 21, the AJS, which is funded through Circle of Care and generous contributors, will celebrate Seniors Month at a lunch and program titled "Tap Into Your Creative Self For Your Good Health," to be held at Earl Bales Community Centre. There is no charge for members and $3 for guests.

AJS membership is open to any seniors group or individual.

Its executive members include Goldmintz, Carl Kellen, Ray Sadowski, Evelyn Shulman, Esther Pohn and Gerry Hurwitz.

For more information on the AJS or to register for its June 21 program, call Debbie Bernstein, 416-635-2860, ext. 458, or e-mail ajs@circleofcare.com.

Parents petition Ont. Tories on day school funding

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Parents of children in Jewish day schools poured out their hearts in meetings last week with senior Ontario Progressive Conservatives, saying the province's failure to fund faith-based schools amounts to "blatant discrimination."

The half-dozen parents joined officials from the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS) to describe for senior Tories the hardships and sacrifices they endure when faced with crushing tuition and no help from the government.

It was all part of a task force struck recently by the Conservatives to gauge public sentiment on a variety of education-related issues. Party leader John Tory has begun wide-ranging public consultations, saying he wants to hit the ground running for the next election, scheduled for the autumn of 2007.

Last Wednesday morning at Queen's Park, OAJDS co-presidents Ira Walfish and Aaron Blumenfeld briefed Conservative MPP Ted Arnott (Waterloo-Wellington), a former parliamentary secretary to the education minister, on the mechanics of how funding faith-based schools would work.

The OAJDS submission, a 46-page effort replete with number-crunching tables and charts, concluded that the preferred option is a tax credit with no income threshold.

"We believe this recommendation best meets the policy objectives of providing choice to the recipients and at the same time removes the current discriminatory policy of favouring one religion [Catholicism] over all others," the brief stated.

Jewish day schools have faced declining enrolment "primarily due to affordability, which has been financially disastrous for some schools," Blumenfeld told Arnott. "A lot of our schools are in financial crisis."

Task force consults community

Some 45 per cent of all children in Jewish day schools are subsidized, Blumenfeld added.

And the government's policy of funding Roman Catholic schools but not other faith-based ones makes non-Catholic children feel "like second-class citizens in their own country."

At a meeting immediately following with Arnott and several Tory advisors and aides, Jewish parents laid bare their feelings.

Georgeanne Burke, a longtime funding advocate and founding member of the OAJDS, choked up when she recalled that one year, her tuition bill was nearly $50,000 for her and her husband's six children.

But it was worth it, she said, because of the "good derived" from a Jewish education that taught her children "tolerance and respect."

For many Jewish families, a public school education is a non-starter, said Cari Kozierok Behar, four of whose five children attend a day school.

"For us to properly educate our children in Hebrew and Jewish social values, we need the immersive quality of a day school," she said.

Bruce Gilboord, a financial planner who is active in Conservative politics, says he has noticed that parents with children in the Jewish education system have higher levels of stress and often drive older cars, and they have lower levels of investment in such things as RRSPs.

"Our heritage costs," he said.

Speaking personally, Alex Roman, a senior Conservative advisor, said the constitutional requirement to publicly fund Catholic schools "has to be opened up" because in Ontario, most Catholic students are no longer French.

Roman called the failure to fund all faith-based education "legislated discriminatory practices based on religion."

Aryeh Snitman, who has two children at United Synagogue Day School, presented the officials with a 5,000-name petition calling on the government to fund faith-based schools. He called the current situation "blatant discrimination."

The petition was also presented to the Liberals, who cancelled the Tories' landmark Equity in Education Tax Credit after assuming power in 2003.

The OAJDS said it will seek similar meetings with Liberal MPPs in the coming months.

Stratford's Ottawa connection

From the editor's desk

Hard work, discipline and unflinching resolve are the midwives of success. When we see our youngsters using these virtues to give birth to their dreams, it is important that we write about it.

Two very talented young people from Ottawa have worked extremely hard to realize their dream of a career in the theatre. And what a theatre it is this summer and fall: The Stratford Festival of Canada.

Jennifer Waiser is in her second season at Stratford. This year, she plays Little Red Riding Hood in Into the Woods, and appears in Hello Dolly.

Born in Montreal, she moved to Ottawa when she was five years old. She was "great friends" with the Gould family, another Ottawa household whose children – Jennifer, Adrienne and Jonathan – have graced the stage at Stratford.

With a bouncy, friendly enthusiasm that did not abate throughout our conversation, the actress, who is in her late 20s, told The CJN that "acting is definitely a calling. It chooses you. It's what I want to do."

And she has done it for most of her young life, at school and for 11 years at Camp B'nai Brith. But her formal drama education received a major boost when she enrolled in the Canterbury Arts High School in Grade 12 and part of Grade 13.

At the end of Grade 12, Waiser won a major acting role in Toronto in a David Mirvish production of Jane Eyre. She admitted to be being a bit nervous for that part. "Am I good enough to be doing this?" she asked herself. But she took considerable comfort in the fact that she could and she did. It was a both a humbling and a maturing experience.

After high school, Waiser continued her drama studies at Ryerson University.

Despite her young age, Waiser has a long list of acting credits in her portfolio, including the title role in The Diary of Anne Frank at the Bathurst Street Theatre in Toronto. In 2002, she was nominated for a Dora Award for her portrayal of Queen Victoria in Sky Gilbert's The Boy Jones.

Wise, veteran maturity shone through our conversation. "It is very important to know one's strengths and weaknesses. I know what roles I am right for and the roles I am wrong for.

"In creating a character, you know you are going to be judged every day. Some of those judgments will be negative, but you must take it in stride. Criticism is never-ending. You always have to prove yourself."

Gabriel Wolinsky

If she has been hurt by the inevitable criticism, it did not show in our discussion. She chose to emphasize the sources of her confidence rather than any reasons for doubt.

"Because the production schedule is so demanding, time is scarce. Family and friends become ever more precious, and choosing relaxing, restorative pastimes ever more important. If I didn't have the family, friends and resources that I had, I might not have been able to make this a reality."

Jennifer Waiser

Her advice to youngsters dreaming of a life on stage is both lofty and pragmatic. "Think that it is possible and take as many classes as you can so that you are ready when the chance comes."

* * *

Not that long ago,Gabriel Wolinsky was taking his cues and his instructions from Jennifer Waiser, who was his counsellor at Camp B'nai Brith.

This year, he'll be with her on stage at Stratford, where he makes his debut in Hello Dolly and The Tempest.

For 13 of his 20 years, Wolinksy has been dancing. Like Waiser, Wolinsky came from "a creative and artistic home" that encouraged and supported his theatre aspirations and imbued in him a strong identification with the Jewish community.

He began his dance lessons at the Greta Leeming Studio of Dance with the intricacies of jazz, then added tap and ballet, which he described as the foundation of all dance, to his skills.

"Dancing is hard and great and wonderful," Wolinsky told The CJN. "I want it to be challenging." For the effervescently enthusiastic artist, no challenge could be greater right now than performing on the stage of one of the world's pre-eminent theatres.

His advice to youngsters dreaming of a life on stage echoes that of his former camp counsellor. "Don't give up. This business is tough. Keep going. If you get rejected, that means the job was not right for you. Keep going."

Though Wolinsky is making his debut at Stratford, it is certainly not his professional dancing debut. He recently performed in A Chorus Line in Toronto and Cats at the Neptune Theatre in Halifax.

* * *

Adrienne Gould, about whom I wrote in this space last year, performs the lead role of Miranda in The Tempest this year.

***

Next month, I will write about Evan Stillwater and Sammy Rosen, two other young adults whose dreams have taken them to the Stratford stage. –MBD

LONDON BACKS JERUSALEM: About 125 members of the Jewish community in London, Ont., marked Yom Yerushalayim on June 5 by marching in support of Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel. More Israeli withdrawals will occur, Olmert says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's planned withdrawal from the Gaza Strip this summer will not be its last from the territories, Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert revealed last week.

"There is no trade-off between Gaza and the West Bank," he said in a conference call from New York City.

"This is the initial chapter, not the last one," added Olmert, who is considered a close adviser to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Olmert would not delve into further details, explaining that discussing the issue now would be premature and unhelpful.

But he did say Israel is prepared to make "painful concessions" in the interests of achieving a two-state solution to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Olmert, the former two-term mayor of Jerusalem, warned that the success of Israel's unilateral disengagement from Gaza will determine the next step in the political process with the Palestinians.

"Everything depends on it," he declared. "It's essential for it to be carried out successfully."

Describing the scheduled withdrawal as the "most significant and historic" political initiative Israel has ever undertaken, Olmert said it marks the first time an Israeli government has chosen to dismantle settlements in an area considered historically Jewish.

Olmert said the plan requires great courage for at least three reasons: Settlements are the "purest manifestation" of the return of Jews to their historic homeland. As well, the disengagement, due to launched in mid-August, has aroused a vociferous backlash from settlers and their supporters, and Sharon has always been partial to settlements beyond the Green Line.

Nevertheless, the prime minister is determined to move forward, Olmert said.

"We are going ahead and will implement the disengagement," he said, calling the pullout "one of the most fundamental concessions" in Israel's history.

Sharon believes it can break the current status quo, lead Israel and the Palestinians to a new phase in negotiations and generate better relations with the Arabs, Olmert added.

Claiming the move was not forced on Israel by outside pressures, he said the withdrawal proposal was adopted by a majority of Israeli parliamentarians and is good for the country.

If friction between the Israeli army and Palestinian civilians can be reduced, the prospects for peace can be reinvigorated, he suggested.

In a pointed remark, he said Jewish settlers in Gaza will not enjoy security as long as they remain there.

Conceding that cross-border terrorism may plague Israel once it withdraws from Gaza, Olmert promised Israel will fight it with all its military might.

He dismissed criticism by Israel's ex-chief of staff, Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, that the pullout may worsen Israel's situation. "He can be mistaken," said Olmert, taking pains to express his admiration for Ya'alon's contributions to the state.

Attempting to make a case for withdrawal, Olmert said it's incumbent on politicians to change with the times. As an example, he cited his own opposition to the 1978 Camp David accords with Egypt.

"I was wrong to vote against it," he said.

If Israel had not vacated the Sinai Peninsula in accordance with the Camp David agreement, he argued, Israel and Egypt may well have been driven to the brink of war.

Olmert said the Israeli army is prepared for problems once the withdrawal from Gaza takes place.

He praised Mahmoud Abbas, the newly elected president of the Palestinian Authority, for being "wholeheartedly against terrorism."

"We have a lot of respect for Abu Mazen," he said, using Abbas' nickname.

But decrying the recent Islamic Jihad mortar attack that killed two Palestinian workers and one Chinese field hand in Gaza's Gush Katif settlement bloc, Olmert said Abbas has not done enough to stop terrorism.

If the Palestinian Authority fails to rein in terrorism, Israel will do it itself, Olmert asserted.

Israel, in tandem with the United States and the European Union, must assist Abbas in improving economic conditions for the Palestinians.

"We want to build up positive forces and strengthen the Palestinian leadership. This is our strategy."

In a reference to last January's election in the Palestinian Authority, Olmert said the Palestinians have begun moving toward democracy, and that is important for Israel. "We're fully behind it, and we respect it."

Responding to a question about Iran's efforts to acquire a nuclear arsenal, he said Israel cannot resolve the issue itself.

According to Olmert, the matter should be addressed through political means by the United States and the European Union.

Documentary recalls Iraq's rich Jewish heritage

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Imagine Iraq teeming with Jewish life and culture, with Jews occupying high positions in government and comprising nearly half the population of Baghdad.

That scenario seems almost imponderable in today's Iraq, where anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism flourish and a mere 22 Jews call the embattled country home. But it was the reality less than a century ago.

The story of what happened to this dynamic community is the subject of a new documentary film titled The Last Jews of Baghdad: End of an Exile; Beginning of a Journey, which was screened recently at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

"It's very interesting to delve into what happens when you take a whole group of people out of a society," said Carole Basri, who co-directed and produced the film with Adriana Davis and Bryan Durr.

"I think [that society] loses some of its humanity."

Human rights in the Middle East is the main issue explored in the film, which provides first-person reflections of Jews who experienced both peaceful and fruitful times in Iraq, as well as persecution and exile.

"I try to build bridges so that everybody can understand all the pain that's occurred in the Middle East," said Basri, a New York lawyer and scion of a well-known Iraqi Jewish family.

"I've shown this film to Arabs and Muslims who said, 'We didn't know this happened.' When there is a feeling of common pain, then answers can be found."

Iraq's Jewish community dates back 2,700 years, and prior to the creation of Israel, it boasted a population of 160,000.

Iraqi Jews were patriotic and highly integrated into Iraqi society.

"I interviewed over 100 Iraqi Jews… and they loved that country very much," said Davis, co-founder of D-Squared Media.

"They were a part of the creation of the country when Britain granted it independence in 1932."

The film focuses on the years when Iraq became a dangerous place for Jews, beginning in the early 1930s, when they encountered institutionalized discrimination, largely as the result of the coming to power of a pro-Nazi government.

In 1934, Basri said, the government began imposing Nazi-inspired statutes, such as restricting the distance Jews could travel.

A succession of laws, including discriminatory quotas in schools, the banning of business partnerships between Jews and Muslims and the introduction of an anti-Jewish school curriculum, soon followed.

In 1941, a pro-Nazi coup sparked rioting and a pogrom of Jews in Baghdad, which left close to 200 Jews dead.

"In 1948… Jews had to pay $80 million for the war effort against Israel," Basri said.

"The only way you could leave was to renounce your citizenship."

Many Jews made that choice. From 1949 to 1951, more than 100,000 Iraqi Jews fled to Israel and thousands more went to Iran.

"The [Iraqi government] took away their property and said all they can take out is 50 dinars," Basri said.

For the Jews who remained, life became increasingly precarious. The most notorious example of the plight they faced was the 1969 public hangings of several Jews, which was turned into a national holiday.

"The hangings in 1969 made the world press, but nothing happened about it afterwards," said Davis.

"We just want it to be clear that this is the history. It's the truth told from the people who lived it."

Basri said the oppression of Iraq's Jews laid the foundation for Saddam Hussein's persecution of the country's other ethnic groups.

The Last Jews of Baghdad is the third in a trilogy of productions about Iraqi Jews, following The Life of Frank Iny: A Granddaughter's Journey and Searching for Baghdad: A Daughter's Journey.

Justice for Jewish refugees too

The fact that the war launched against the nascent State of Israel in 1948 by its neighbouring Arab states created two sets of refugees has been mostly forgotten in the past 30 years. The international community has focused only on the plight of the Arab refugees. But there were Jewish refugees as well.

In 1957, Auguste Lindt, of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) confirmed the existence of Jewish refugees in consequence of their flight from Egypt. Ten years later, in 1967, Dr. E Jahn, of the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees said, "I refer to our recent discussion concerning Jews from Middle Eastern and North African countries… Such persons may be considered prima facie within the mandate of this office." And 10 years after that, after the Camp David Accords were signed in 1977, then-U.S. president Jimmy Carter said the Jewish refugees "have the same rights as others do."

Indeed, there were as many as 850,000 Jewish refugees from Arab lands after the founding of the State of Israel. But the international community, will no longer be able to ignore the injustices that were done to them.

Last week, representatives from some 14 international Jewish communities met in Paris to reinvigorate efforts to assert the human rights of the nearly one million Jewish refugees from Arab countries. A campaign to that effect will be launched in March 2006.

Stanley Urman, the executive director of Justice for Jews from Arab Lands, one of the groups that helped convene the Paris gathering, told The CJN that the campaign will have two essential elements: "highlighting the mass violation of human rights versus Jews and their flight as refugees and cataloguing individual and communal losses. We found in some of our research a pattern of orchestrated repression… in 10 Arab countries. There were murders, arbitrary detentions and expulsions in all countries."

The Canadian representative in Paris, Bernie Farber, CEO of the Canadian Jewish Congress, stated emphatically that "we want this issue on the radar screen." The CJC will follow up on comments made by Prime Minister Paul Martin to The CJN last week that "[A] refugee is a refugee." The prime minister said that "we've got to be prepared [to take Jewish claims] into consideration." His statement was as welcome as it was precedent-setting. For no western leader in modern times has put on the record so definitively the need to achieve justice for Jewish refugees from Arab lands.

Security Council 242, which was adopted in 1967 as a framework for finally finding a solution to the Arab-Israel conflict, envisions that Arab and Jewish refugee issues would be resolved. It refers to "a just settlement of the refugee problem" without differentiating between Arab and Jewish refugee claims.

Urman told The CJN that "Canada could play an important role in pushing for Jewish refugee rights." The forthright pronouncement by the prime minister should be the impetus for that – for helping achieve justice for all the refugees of the Arab-Israeli conflict, including the Jews.

PM's late conclusion about Hamas

Prime Minister Paul Martin should be commended for recognizing Hamas as a terrorist organization ("Hamas are terrorists: Martin," CJN, June 9). After all, this group has been on the federal government's banned terrorist list for a few years, and prior to him becoming prime minister.

With the prime minister finally arriving at this conclusion, would it be too much for us to ask Martin and his cabinet ministers to take the next logical step and stop Canadian tax dollars ($10 million annually) from being used to employ Hamas members at the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA)?

Perhaps the prime minister can go one step further and tell Canadians whether the Liberal government of Canada will recognize Hamas' democratically elected representatives, or will they only recognize and support Fatah's political representatives, as we did when Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas visited Canada recently.

German-Israeli relations aren't warm

There is something misleading in the headline of Sheldon Kirshner's piece, "Germany forges warm, complicated ties with Israel," (CJN, June 2). Very little in his article suggests the warm relationship between the two countries. In one detail after another, Kirshner relates the German public's consistent rejection of Israel's reasons for its actions in the perpetual war waged against the Jewish state by implacable Islamic foes. In fact, it's the Germans' acceptance of Palestinian propaganda as the real picture that shatters the cozy image of a warm relationship. In addition, Germany's "real concerns" about "some of Israel's policies" chill this correspondent to the bone. Sadly, Germany is no more Israel's friend than France is. As for the relationship, complicated, perhaps. Warm? Hardly.

Saint John's Jews overlooked in book

As principal of a large Toronto supplementary school and as a former Maritimer, I waited with anticipation and excitement for the publication of the Canadian Jewish history book Telling Our Story: A History of the Jews in Canada to 1920. In the article "BJE: not the Toronto District School Board" (CJN, March 24), the book was described as the fruit of an Etgar project, in which three teachers from different Jewish day schools worked together to produce it. When I finally saw it on the day of its launch, I can only describe my reaction as one of heartbreak and disbelief.

The chapter titled "The Maritimes" consisted of pages, reducing the entire region to the mention of Halifax. When I came to Toronto in the early 1970s, I was appalled by the general ignorance and disinterest of Jewish people who, on hearing that I was from Saint John, N.B., would respond, "Oh, are there really Jews there?" In the year 2005, I am stunned that the authors, editors and Etgar judges of this book would be perpetuating this ignorance in every student who will now be given this book as an official text.

When I think of how little effort was required to do even an adequate job on this section, I could weep. One call to the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) office in Halifax and one question, "Who can I contact in the various Atlantic provinces to fill me in on the history of their communities?" would have been highly productive. Even one single copy of Shalom Magazine, published twice yearly by the AJC, would have given the authors contacts in every community.

Each Atlantic province was host to immigrants disembarking on their shores. The harbours of Saint John and Halifax didn't freeze in the winter, so they could accommodate ships all year round. Partridge Island, just off the harbour in Saint John, had a fully functioning lighthouse and served as a quarantine station much like Ellis Island in New York.

The three main waves of immigration to the East Coast have been traced back almost 200 years. Saint John's award-winning Jewish Historical Museum receives thousands of visitors each summer. This museum has extensive archives, which are used by historians across Canada, and has published Weaving the Past into the Present: A Glimpse into the 130 Year History of the Saint John Jewish Community" (1989) by Marica Koven.

I understand that space was limited, but there is a lot more history that Jewish students should know about, even if Telling Our Story only goes up to 1920, especially in a country where "None is too many."

The damage this book does in perpetuating the ignorance of our rich cultural heritage and contributions to the Canadian mosaic is a disgrace to its authors and a dishonour to all those who have kept, and continue to keep, our Atlantic communities alive.

Jews come 'home' through Taglit-Birthright Israel

By CHARLES BRONFMAN

In Israel, ideas of independence and birthright are so bound up with each other that the first line of the Declaration of Independence refers not to freedom but to the fact that "Israel was the birthplace of the Jewish people."

The special charge of this link underscores the fact that for the majority of Jews, the birthplace of our people is not our current home.

The challenge of sustaining a symbiotic relationship between Israel and world Jewry is synonymous with the challenge of preserving our birthright as Jews, and of nurturing our independence. As is inevitably the case, here too rights translate into responsibilities. Awareness of this special relationship led to the founding of Taglit-Birthright Israel.

Our practical mission has been to enable young Jews from around the world to come "home" to Israel, so they can connect to their historical heritage, experience the rich fabric of life in the Jewish state and, most importantly, meet their peers, who are oh, so very similar and so very different.

Just as there are links between the ideas of birthright and freedom, we operate on the principle that the Jewish people are themselves a series of interlinked chains. If we strengthen one of these links, we strengthen the whole. At the deepest level, we have begun to re-forge the bond between Israel and world Jewry for the next generation.

Years ago, while I was walking in the Old City of Jerusalem, I saw some Israeli children playing in the street. A sense of wonder came over me, and I thought, "Do they understand where they are?" Of course, had I asked them, they would probably have told me that they were home.

I assumed that they were too young to comprehend what a gift Israel was, and my sense of wonder came not only from the awareness of the magnitude of that gift, but from the realization that I, too, was home. Looking back, I think it was that moment that aroused in me a deep desire to promote the unity of the Jewish people, whose soul was and is in Jerusalem.

Today, through Taglit-Birthright Israel, nearly 85,000 young Jews from more than 40 countries have already experienced Israel, thanks to the commitment and hard work of visionary philanthropists, Jewish communities from around the world and Israel. This partnership, focusing on the younger generation as the foundation of the future of the Jewish people, places Israel in the centre of a new, pulsating dynamic with Diaspora Jewry.

"Welcome home." That is the first thing a Taglit-Birthright Israel participant hears when setting foot in Israel for the first time. Whether or not, at that moment, it rings true for him or her, I can assure you that 10 days later, in departing Israel, that person is leaving the home of his or her Jewish soul.

"Stepping into Israel was an amazing feeling," wrote Nurit Roded, who attended Birthright Israel during the 2002-03 winter session. "This was a place I had always learned about and read about and heard stories about, but it was always sort of abstract. I never really thought about what Israel was and what it meant. It all became clear to me within the first few days of my trip."

What is abundantly clear is that Taglit-Birthright Israel works, and that its impact lasts, because it is anything but abstract. Through mifgashim (encounters), on an eye-to-eye level, between more than 10,000 young Israelis – primarily Israel Defence Forces officers and soldiers from elite units – and busload after busload of young Jews from around the world, we have created thousands of real relationships that were not there before.

We are encouraging Diaspora Jewry to make their physical and spiritual engagement with Israel a core element of their Jewish identity. Studies of Taglit-Birthright Israel participants show that four years after the experience, feeling connected to Israel and to the Jewish people are the most prominent effects of the trip.

We have also supported Israel's economy through troubled times, with progressive increases in numbers of participants despite the collapse of tourism to Israel. In fact, Taglit-Birthright Israel is the biggest tour operator for incoming tourism in the country, responsible for many hundreds of millions of shekels in revenues.

The impact of these trips is not solely on the visitors. The 12,000 Israelis involved to date are equally transformed by the encounter. Four out of five Israelis now believe that the government should invest in embracing the young generation of the Diaspora. The IDF tells us that participation in mifgashim has become an important educational aspect of military service.

As it turns out, some of the most profound feelings of connection are forged from the sudden realization that, despite their similarities in appearance, worldview or even tastes in music, there's a vast difference in experience among these peers.

I was on Ammunition Hill on one of these trips when the group was learning about the 1967 Six Day War and the reunification of Jerusalem. The madrich asked how many of them knew someone who had died violently. Only one of the American kids raised a hand; every one of the Israelis had lost someone in war or a terrorist experience. That knowledge seared the souls of the non-Israelis, and drew everyone closer.

"Before, I was flying for Israel," said one F-16 pilot. "Now, I understand that I am flying for the Jewish people."

Our vision at Taglit-Birthright Israel is to ensure the continued connection of the Jewish people by strengthening Jewish meaning, identity and community. Why does Taglit-Birthright Israel work so well? The experience is both immediate and rich with history, which makes the educational aspect relevant, with personal connections and powerful Jewish values.

Simply put, Jews the world over need one another. Disconnected, we fall. United, we stand forever.

Charles Bronfman is the founder of Taglit-Birthright Israel.

March distorts Poland's image

The March of the Living, which for the last 18 years has taken some 100,000 young Jews to Poland for Yom Hashoah and then to Israel for Yom Ha'atzmaut, strengthens the participants' Jewish identity. The experience has brought many of them closer to Judaism and the Jewish people.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

But the project, admirable though it is, has its flaws and we would be doing it a disservice by ignoring them.

An obvious flaw is the potential distortion of Jewish theology. Taking the participants from Auschwitz to Jerusalem has, I fear, left many with the impression that the Holocaust somehow validates Israel. But Israel does not need such validation and the horrors of the Shoah defy simplistic explanations, however patriotically couched.

Another flaw is in the misrepresentation of Jewish history. From the beginning, Polish Jews, especially the young, were dismayed that their peers from abroad considered them renegades because they live in Poland. The visitors failed to see that, despite the terrible past, some Polish Jews are bound to the land and the culture of their birth. In this respect, they are not different from Jews elsewhere in the Diaspora. In recent years, the disdain from abroad seems to have been toned down. Nowadays, some young Poles, Jews and non-Jews, even join the March.

But too little is still being done to show that many, especially young, non-Jewish Poles, are anxious to learn from the past and keen to stem the tide of anti-Semitism. Without wishing to deny the prevalence of anti-Jewish sentiments in today's Poland – as in virtually all other countries, especially in Europe – we must also acknowledge the valiant efforts by many Poles to fight it. The Canadian contingent has been one of still too few delegations trying to bring together March participants with their Polish peers.

The Polish government – which, together with its German counterpart, is probably Israel's best advocate in the European Union – is said to have complained about the harmful effect the unbalanced approach of the March has on Polish-Jewish and Polish-Israeli relations. The government of Israel has taken note, for it values its ties with the new Poland.

Recently, too, Israeli scholars have urged March organizers to make the participants aware of the more than 800 years of Jewish history and creativity in Poland. For it is not only a land of catastrophe. Most Ashkenazi Jews come from Polish territories. The roots of their rich heritage must not be forgotten.

The March of the Living, like most other visits to Poland, is potentially a good educational tool. The challenge of those responsible is not to squander the opportunities by clouding them in obsolete ideology and thoughtless prejudice. Canadian Jewry could show the way.

Non-Jewish marchers taught me a lot

I have a bit of an insecurity about being typical. I don't like to be a typical girlfriend or a typical punk rock or hip hop fan, and I love to play the devil's advocate.

I realized the real extent of that insecurity when I found that my anticipation of the March of the Living was weighted with a worry that my expectations for a typical March experience would come true.

Jessica Apter in Vancouver

Without at all denying the importance of the major and obvious lessons to be learned from the March of the Living – and despite the wisdom of the words of a close friend, who reminded me that clichés become clichés because they represent universal ideas – my trip to Poland and Israel with other Jewish and non-Jewish Canadian university students left me with impressions that surprised me and will never be forgotten.

What was perhaps most unique about my experience is that some of the most profound moments of the two-week trip occurred because of the presence of the non-Jewish students participating in the cross-Canada multicultural student track of the program, a first for the March of the Living.

While I can definitely understand where my Jewish peers were coming from when they expressed discomfort at their presence in a very nationalistically, emotionally and historically significant setting, I felt just the opposite. In fact, I drew quite a bit of strength from the fact these students, some of whom hadn't previously met many Jews, would travel from Canada to Poland for a less-than-joyous trip, marching alongside 18,000 Jews in commemoration of our grandparents, great-grandparents and children who died 60 years ago.

But in two significant ways, they also helped make concrete my understanding of the phrase "Never again" and the importance of learning and teaching about the Holocaust.

First, I was able to witness how visiting Poland led them to understand the historical uniqueness of the Holocaust and gave them increased sensitivity in their understanding of Zionism and how it's tied to being Jewish.

Second, while we Jews were understandably focused on yearning for a glimpse of our families' pre-Holocaust lives and mourning our lost relatives, they had the unique ability to look outside their immediate surroundings. They reminded us about the genocides occurring today and our responsibility as humans to act against them. They helped me realize the difference between Holocaust education for the sake of Holocaust education – a circle I sometimes find myself in – and Holocaust education for the sake of bettering the world.

But these students did more than provide a unique perspective and demonstrate solidarity, compassion and understanding. Most importantly, and without realizing it, they also helped me learn an important lesson about my Jewish identity. In the past, I took being Jewish for granted. In my circles, there was a stigma attached to Israeli and Jewish singing, dancing, and even prayer – never mind that I'm tone deaf and self-conscious about these things.

For Shabbat in Poland, the ruach I felt in and around me surpassed anything I had ever felt before. Perhaps it was because we all needed a release from the weight of the previous week, or maybe it was our intense desire to recreate, for one Shabbat, the experiences of our great-grandparents and the Jewish spirit and energy that once thrived in Europe.

Amazed at the sights of a crowd-surfing Orthodox rabbi and hundreds of Jews spilling out of a hotel into the streets of Warsaw in song and dance, as well as a post-dinner "tish" of drinking and storytelling, some of the non-Jewish students approached me to say that if Christianity were as much fun as Judaism, they would be the most religious Christians ever. They also asked if there would be another chance to dance more.

At that moment, I realized just how much about my religion I had taken for granted, and I decided to make a conscious effort to abandon my inhibitions when it comes to spirituality.

My March of the Living experience was indeed far from typical, and I am indebted to those students who helped me see it from the outside in, so that I could so deeply benefit both the academically and spiritually.

Tales from a solo traveller

Baguettes and brie, champagne and patisserie – it is a difficult life I must endure. Okay, not quite. It is my third week in Paris, and I have already become accustomed to leisurely afternoons in cafes and some of the most beautiful surroundings one could imagine.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

Last night, I was sitting in bed and all of a sudden it hit me: I have graduated university, and in the fall, I will start law school. The best part, though, is that for the next four weeks, I am totally on my own exploring Europe's most beautiful cities, with all the time in the world to reflect on everything that has happened so quickly over the past four years.

And while there is time for reflection and analysis, there is also time for pure, unadulterated enjoyment.

As I walk through the varied arrondissements of Paris, a building, statue or monument captures my eye with its beauty, history and character every few minutes.

This city is magnificent. Every corner has something to offer. The opulence of the Opéra Garnier and the grandeur of the Champs Elysées, the character of the Marais (complete with kosher delis and falafel stands) and the daily life in the XVth arrondissement where I live – every corner has something different for me to enjoy.

I spend my days (after French class of course!) wandering through the Paris neighbourhoods. After a year of going non stop, constantly running from obligation to obligation, surrounded by familiar faces and places, I am taking full advantage of the opportunity to be wholly independent in a totally foreign place.

Of course, there are times when I wonder what I'm doing over here all by myself. I am living with a Frenchwoman who does not speak a word of English. We have dinner every night and we do our best to communicate and fill in the blanks left by idiomatic expressions and obscure vocabulary.

It is a great experience and ideal for French immersion, but there are moments when you just want to be understood, when you want your creature comforts and your privacy. So this summer continues to be a tremendous learning experience, as I not only adapt to a different culture, but find a means of feeling at home in it.

Forget the comments you've heard about Paris being wonderful except for the French – we've all heard them. I have found that people are helpful and friendly and willing to tolerate bad, flawed French, even helping with grammatical and syntactical errors. The average Jacques on the street is more than willing to offer directions. Even when dressed in a suit, he is not consumed by an all-encompassing need to "get somewhere," as is often the case in downtown Toronto.

What is perhaps most interesting is to experience a city that so powerfully embraces its own culture and history. In Canada, whether we live in Toronto, Halifax or elsewhere, we are in an immigrant country with no real Canadian culture to celebrate – or so I would argue. And while I am not naive about Paris's lack of ethnic tolerance, there is a positive aspect of cultural pride that, as a Canadian, I find it interesting to experience.

Every building here is rich with history. Sitting in the Théâtre du Champs Elysées, I participated in the audience's vociferous call for an encore at the end of a symphony thinking that in the very same theatre, audiences revolted against Stravinsky's Rite of Spring, a revolutionary composition and ballet that shocked audiences.

Of course, you may say, this is the case with all old cities, but for one who is not so well-travelled, yet educated in history and culture, it is really a tremendous experience to connect with these historic places and all that transpired – good and bad – within their walls.

In less than a week, I will be off to Italy and then Spain. I can now begin to understand why travelling has come to be a rite of passage following graduation. Thrown out into the world with a degree and – supposedly – a head full of knowledge, we experience something new that allows for a little digestion and a little pause – both needed during this period of crazy transition.

The Kirshner File

Russians change Germany's Jewish community

Yuri Rosov, Valerie Bunimov and Ekatarina (Katya) Epstein represent the new face of Germany's burgeoning Jewish community. They are among the 200,000 Russians who have immigrated to Germany since the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989 and the collapse of the Soviet Union just two years later. Before these historic events, Germany was home to a declining community of some 30,000 Jews, the vast majority from eastern and central Europe. But once the floodgates opened, Germany, wracked by guilt over its role in the Holocaust, granted the Soviet emigrants – half of whom were not halachically Jewish and some of whom were not even Jewish – the right of immigration and generous welfare benefits.

Sheldon Kirshner in Rostock

And though some of these rights were curtailed in January, Jews from the former Soviet Union, mainly Russia and Ukraine, continue pouring into the country. According to Jan Muhlstein, the director of the Union of Progressive Jews in Germany, a further 27,000 Soviet Jews have been given permission to immigrate under the old regulations, while an additional 20,000 already have filed applications. Stefan Szajak, the longtime director of Frankfurt's Jewish community, expects 100,000 more Russian Jews to settle in Germany in the next decade.

This remarkable influx has catapulted German Jewry, with 89 separate communities, into the third-largest and fastest-growing Jewish community in western Europe. It is a development that astounds no less a figure than the president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, Paul Spiegel. "No one, but no one, would have believed in 1945 that there could ever be Jewish life in Germany again." A community the Nazis destroyed has arisen from the ashes of the Holocaust.

Many of the new immigrants, particularly the older ones, have had problems learning the language, finding jobs and fitting in. But they have definitely left an imprint, as they have in Israel, Canada and the United States. "They've enriched our community," said Salomon Korn, the 61-year-old Polish-born vice-president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany. "They've brought in new blood."

His assessment is widely shared. "They can make a very big contribution," observed Micha Brumlik, a Frankfurt university philosophy professor. "They will form the community's new leadership." Szajak, who was born in Poland, noted, "They're a cultural asset and better educated than the Jews from eastern Europe."

A sizable proportion of the newly arrived emigrants, who now comprise 80 per cent of Jews in Germany, dwell in the eastern states, or lander, which were part and parcel of East Germany – a Marxist state – prior to reunification in 1990. In a few cities there, the Jewish population is actually higher than it was prior to the Nazi era. In an attempt to learn more about these newcomers, I visited two such communities, Rostock and Schwerin, both in the economically depressed state of Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania. Yet Soviet Jews also live in Dresden, Chemnitz, Erfurt and other cities in this corner of Germany.

Once a prosperous Hanseatic federation port and much later East Germany's main outlet to the Baltic Sea, Rostock, with 200,000 residents, was in decline when the first Russians appeared in the 1990s. From 103 Jews in 1994, the Jewish population had climbed to 674 by last month, surpassing the pre-1933 total. Under the Nazi regime, life was bleak. The Moorish-style synagogue, finished in 1897, was destroyed by fire on Kristallnacht in 1938. The remaining Jews were deported to Theresienstadt, Auschwitz and Riga. Arnold Bernhard, the community's last Nazi-era president, died in a gas chamber in 1944.

Rosov, the community's 44-year-old president, said that 100 per cent of its inhabitants hail from the former Soviet Union and 50 per cent are in mixed marriages and possess little or no knowledge about Judaism and Jewish customs. He arrived eight years ago with his wife and two children, aged 13 and 19, to escape the rising tide of Ukrainian nationalism, which sometimes spilled into outright anti-Semitism, and to ensure a brighter future for his family. He has no qualms about living in a country that demonized and murdered Jews, believing he is completely safe here.

A playwright back in Crimea, he currently works for the community centre's Jewish theatre. That he is still a Ukrainian citizen is hardly unusual. Only 10 to 15 Soviet Jews in Rostock – the biggest city in northeastern Germany – have acquired German citizenship. Seventy per cent hold university degrees, but that has not helped them obtain gainful employment, or escape the welfare rolls. Their job skills, their difficulty in mastering German and their age structure – 33 percent are 61 or older – work against them. "Many are very disappointed," said Rosov. Ilona Jerjomin, a Russian-speaking German employed by the community, said, "Some came here with big illusions."

Young Russians, however, have no such problems and are adapting to German society. Rostock's mayor, Roland Methling, welcomes them all. As he told me, "We are proud to have this community in our city, and we are doing everything to help them." The immigrants are eligible for subsidized housing and German-language lessons and, if jobless, can apply for special stipends. Methling claimed that neo-Nazism, which roiled Rostock immediately after German reunification, has virtually faded away.

Rostock's all-purpose Jewish community centre, which contains a shul, Sunday school and library, was refurbished by the municipality. Members can join a choir, a dance group or a visual arts circle. Prayer services are led by William Wolff, an itinerant rabbi originally from Britain who also ministers to the religious needs of 1,000 Jews in Schwerin, a picturesque town of 115,0000 famous for its quaint half-timbered buildings.

Valerie Bunimov

Bunimov, a 57-year-old electrical engineer who immigrated to Germany from Kharkov 11 years ago, said that Jews in Schwerin are ex-Soviets like himself. Amazingly enough, Schwerin's Jewish population is higher today than it was during the heyday of the Weimar Republic, said Bunimov, who was driven to emigrate by anti-Semitism and by a desire to improve his children's prospects.

As in Rostock, most of Schwerin's Jewish residents have yet to attain German citizenship, lack employment, are 60 or older and have non-Jewish wives or husbands. "Only 10 percent of our able-bodied people have jobs," lamented Bunimov, whose own employment record in Germany has been spotty. "Members of our community will take any job," said Adolf Schien, a 77-year-old pensioner from Odessa. Not surprisingly, Bunimov takes fatherly pride in the fact that his 28-year-old son, Viktor, is a research assistant in computer science at a university in Kiel, in Schleswig-Holstein.

Bunimov decided to settle in Germany because Israel's climate fazed him and because he calculated that his chances of getting into the United States or Canada were slim. To him, Germany's Nazi past was not problematic, even though his grandmother's relatives were murdered during the Holocaust. He chose eastern rather than western Germany because the shorter waiting period enabled him to emigrate sooner rather than later.

Since the passage of new immigration rules nearly six months ago – which place more emphasis on German-language skills and job qualifications and funnel a greater proportion of Jews to Israel – fewer Jewish immigrants have settled in Schwerin. Bunimov hopes that negotiations between the ministry of interior and the Central Council of Jews in Germany will restore lost privileges. He thinks Germany has a special obligation to Jewish immigrants. "You can't compare Jews with asylum seekers from, say, Vietnam."

Acknowledging that the new rules have drastically cut Jewish immigration, Korn said Israel pressed Germany to adopt the new guidelines. Last year, for the first time, Germany absorbed more Soviet Jews than Israel, a development that shocked Israelis.

Many kilometres away from Schwerin, in Hamburg, Felix Epstein, a retired 68-year-old shipbuilding engineer from St. Petersburg, looked back in reflection. He left Russia 13 years ago with the conviction that his 33-year-old daughter, Ekatarina, had no future there. He and his wife live in a modest flat in Bramfeld, a working-class area of Hamburg. "I had problems with Germany's history, but this is a new, democratic Germany."

Ekatarina, a Red Cross economist who resides in the leafy Hamburg suburb of Harburg, feels anything but German. " Maybe, after the Holocaust, a Jew can't be a German," she mused. A graduate of the University of Hamburg who would rather have gone to the United States or Israel, she considers herself a European and only a "guest" in her adopted country. Nonetheless, she feels pretty much at home in Germany, the destination of choice of increasing numbers of Soviet Jews.

Volunteers make the Walk with Israel run

Over 800 community members lend a helping hand for popular event

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

This year's UJA Federation Walk with Israel brought out 15,000 people to celebrate Israel and all her achievements. Logistically, it is no small task to maneuver such a large crowd through seven kilometers of downtown Toronto, while arranging a festival at Ontario Place with refreshments and activities to finish the Walk. Only through the dedicated time and energy of over 800 volunteers is the improbable made possible.

Arthur (Rosy) Rosenzweig has been volunteering at the Walk with Israel for the last 15 years. He is quick to point out that he is merely one small player in a team of over 40 individuals assembled to run the barbeque portion of the RioCan Festival. For 15 years, Rosenzweig's team has been coordinating the barbeque station like a well rehearsed dance, cooking 4,500 beef and veggie dogs, doling out bags of chips and thousands of cans of pop.

"I started out volunteering at the Walk because I'm in the ice cream business and I own refrigerated trucks," Rosenzweig explained. "Fifteen years ago, I turned up with one of my trucks to help transport all the hotdogs and I haven't stopped since. Our whole group looks forward to this all year. It is a fabulous experience."

Ashley Greenberg, 16, has volunteered at the Walk for the last three years. She got involved through a family friend and intends to continue her commitment.

"I worked at the prize booth this year at the RioCan Festival," Greenberg explained. "It's a lot of fun and I love to see the whole community come out and participate. I always bring a friend to get involved too. It's a great event."

Jenny Eisenstein, who has been involved with UJA for the last 20 years, has been volunteering with her sister Regina at the Walk for almost as long. Both sisters, now in their 70s, are Holocaust survivors, having endured the horrors of Auschwitz-Birkenau. Before the war in Zagliember, a province of Poland, the sisters were ardent Zionists involved in youth groups where they studied Hebrew and learned literature, songs and poetry.

"Israel is the most important thing in my life," Jenny said. "I remember after the war in 1948, I was in Sweden and we were glued to our radios listening with our hearts beating intensely, praying for Israel's independence. I have been to Israel many times since. I am a singer and I have performed there as well. Israel was all we ever thought about."

This year the Walk with Israel, which was led by Toronto's Chief of Police, Bill Blair, raised approximately $350,000 which will go toward UJA Federation's annual campaign.

Getting a sense of Spadina

Thirty historically-minded individuals recently got a sense of Spadina during a 90 minute walking tour of the old Jewish neighborhood of Kensington Market in downtown Toronto. The tour on June 5 was a joint venture of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre and UJA Federation's Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA), which has been offering Sense of Spadina tours for over 30 years. The remaining tour dates include: June 26, July 10, July 24, August 7, August 21, September 25 and October 16. To register for a tour, call the OJA @ 416-635-2883 ext. 170 or e-mail: OJA@ujafed.org (Photo by Ilana Hirt)

Paul Penna Jewish Day School honours David Green

The Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School recently held a gala celebrating the downtown Jewish community, while honouring one of its greatest champions, David Green. The gala, chaired by Michaele-Sue Goldblat, Jodi Tanenbaum and Vivienne Ziner, offered attendees a theatrical presentation including appearances by the Whiteley Brothers Band, Sophie Milman and Brent Carver well known for his role in the theatrical production of Kiss of the Spider Woman, to name just a few. The event raised $160,000, surpassing its original fundraising goal.

Green was a fitting honouree for the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School as he was born on Major Street in the Annex (Bloor and Spadina) and still lives in this neighborhood. More importantly, Green was deeply involved in the transformation of the Bloor JCC into its recent incarnation as the Miles Nadal JCC.

"David is supportive, generous and loving," Elysa Cohen, principal of the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, explained. "He has given so much of himself for this project and, in turn, to our school. He has gone above and beyond giving of his time and energy. We are eternally grateful."

As head of the building committee, Green was directly involved in the construction and renovations of the old JCC, solidifying the Miles Nadal JCC as the heart and cornerstone of the downtown Jewish community.

"David has been a part of the downtown core forever," Goldblat noted to an audience of invited guests and patrons. "We are thrilled to honour David this evening."

David Green, Daphne Wagner, and children Lita and Mikey

"We celebrate David as a visionary," City Councilor Olivia Chow said. "As a prominent Toronto business leader, his contribution to the economic growth and development of our great city exemplifies the importance of giving back and contributing to the cultural and spiritual vibrancy of our communities."

"You can't accomplish this type of project on your own; there are many people who did so much to contribute to the success of the centre," said Green. "I am just a figurehead; everybody did something. I just got lucky. I got to be the poster boy."

Membership at the centre is up beyond expectations from 1,800 individuals to 2,600 and Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School enrollment stands at a thriving 100 children.

"You do what you think is right for a community," Green continued. "I am fortunate that I had the right contacts and the time to put into the project. It was very important to me to step up to the plate and do what I could. I am glad that I did."

David Engel elected chair of UJA Federation Board

New leadership ready to meet community challenges

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

David Engel and David Koschitzky will be leading UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for the next two years as chair and vice chair of the Board. Engel replaces outgoing chair Leslie Gales. He was acclaimed for his new position at last week's UJA Federation Annual General Meeting featuring Alon Pinkas, Israel's former Consul General in New York.

Engel, who began his career with UJA Federation in 1978 as the chair of its Young Leadership Division, and who has held many volunteer positions within the organization, outlined some of his priorities.

David Engel

Leslie Gales

"Jewish education is what differentiates our community from so many, and we have to ensure that standards of education are always increasing," said Engel. "We must strive to make it as accessible as possible to all members of our community. Also, it is my goal to renew our relationship with the greater community and in particular, our agencies. We must open a two-way dialogue as to the issues facing our community and how to improve them. We must focus on community building and make the Federation a resource for all."

"To work with David Engel is a wonderful opportunity," said UJA Federation's new vice-chair, David Koschitzky. "He has such a tremendous grasp on the issues facing our community today."

Gales, was instrumental in getting Jewish Toronto Tomorrow and the Tomorrow Campaign off the ground. Through the Tomorrow Campaign UJA Federation is creating three new campuses fro Jewish life in the Greater Toronto Area.

"The past two years have truly been an extraordinary life learning experience," she said. "Most inspiring for me is the passion, the commitment and the time spent by our volunteers; everyone trying to make a difference within our community. Their enthusiasm and dedication have been the driving forces that pushed Toronto's Federation on to the world stage. There wasn't one single day when I failed to realize how privileged I am and how privileged we are, as a strong, collective community."

David Koschitzky

"We are a very fortunate community to have been blessed with the visionary and inspirational leadership of Leslie Gales over these past years," said UJA Federation president, Ted Sokolsky. "They have been exciting and dynamic years for Jewish Toronto and UJA Federation. Leslie's drive and passion have taught us all to think big and plan well. And what's so exciting is that I know first hand that David Engel will continue that tradition."

Neil Nisker honoured as She'arim celebrates 25 years

A unique and important community institution celebrated its 25th anniversary recently by honouring a man known for his contributions to Jewish families throughout Toronto.

More than 400 guests attended Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School's 25th anniversary celebration, which also paid tribute to Neil Nisker, chair of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, the endowment arm of UJA Federation.

She'arim - a Board of Jewish Education affiliated school - is Canada's first and only Jewish day school for children with learning disabilities, located in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

"The real reason I humbly accepted this honour was because She'arim was one of the first organizations in the community to set up an endowment fund under the umbrella of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto," said Nisker. "Tonight is about the celebration of a great school and what it does. Tonight is about celebrating generosity of spirit, acts of kindness, and our people's long-honoured tradition of tzedekah."

Neil Nisker

"Neil's passion for philanthropy and his commitment to community have made him an outstanding leader," says Carol Kassel, director of the Jewish Foundation. "He has developed a very strong philanthropic base for us which combines good business principles with creative planning for the future. It is our hope that he will continue to remain an active member of our board when his term is over on June 30."

Thanks in large part to Nisker's expertise, the Foundation assets currently exceed $125 million in endowments, and another $100 million in known bequests.

"Neil helped us establish the Sara and Sam Hennick Endowment Fund at the Jewish Foundation approximately four years ago, when we moved into our BJCC location," says Faigie Davids, executive director of She'arim. "He even suggested an innovative approach to the annual tribute dinner, dividing the proceeds between the school and their endowment fund, which will ensure future stability for She'arim. Neil has always been a dynamic and well-respected visionary, with a great sensitivity to, and awareness of, all types of disabilities."

Young philanthropists ensure the future of the community

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, UJA Federation's endowment arm, wants parents and their children who are of Bar and Bat Mitvah age to think beyond the big parties and gifts. Through the Foundation's B'nai Tzedek program, teens can open their own endowment funds with $1,000, learning, at the same time, tangible lessons about working to improve Jewish life in Toronto, Israel and the world.

At a recent inaugural event to introduce the program to a new crop of B'nai mitvot, 20 teens were given the opportunity to allocate $1,000 toward the agencies they felt most needed the money. Gerry Richler, an endowment fundholder, and father of Andrew, who is celebrating his Bar Mitzvah, donated the seed money in an effort to inspire and motivate these teens into a life-long habit of giving.

"I have been involved with UJA as a lay person for a long time and I have worked in allocations," he explained. "It is really important to get the next generation of kids committed to philanthropic endeavors. The earlier we get them involved the easier it will be to find our next leadership. As we nurture our children and educate them, we are ensuring the strong future of our community."

The significance of deciding which initiatives to fund was not lost on these teens. The exercise gave them a deeper understanding of where the money UJA raises goes and how difficult the process can be.

Teens who participated in the inaugural B'nai Tzedek program, presented with a plaque for their commitment to youth philanthropy

"It was not easy deciding on where to put the money, to come to a consensus with the group and to figure out which organizations were more deserving," B'nai Tzedek Daniel Hendler, co-chair along with Kady Goldlist, explained. "It was a great learning experience."

The program also educated the teens about how their own Bar/Bat Mitzvah endowment funds can empower them as decision-makers in the community, giving them a voice about funding projects that are meaningful to them.

"Philanthropy is a really great thing, and this program allows you to get started early so that you can watch your fund grow, each year adding a bit more," Hendler continued. "It just feels good to help people and organizations in need."

Environmentalist attempts to lure people to green side

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

If Israeli attitudes about saving the environment are going to improve, efforts must be made to show average citizens the connection between social justice and environmental concerns, says Momo Mahadav, the director of the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel (SPNI).

Mohadav, who began his career as a social worker, has expertise in both fields, and hopes to build a relationship between the two issues and engage more Israelis in the fight to save the environment.

The New Israel Fund of Canada, organizers of the event at Sy and Barbara Landau's home where Mohadav spoke, is usually more concerned with issues of democracy, freedom, justice and equality, but felt that environmental issues are not much of a departure from the organization's ideals.

"What I'm trying to work on is explaining more to people inside and outside Israel that the environmental movement is much more now than just protecting nature and rare species," Mohadav said.

Director of Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel visits Toronto

As an example of how social justice issues can be linked to environmental hazards, he told less than two dozen people about what he considers one of SPNI's greatest accomplishments.

The organization was able to help transform the landfill near the Ben Gurion international airport into a park twice the size of Central Park in New York City.

"Until five years ago, [the landfill] was one of Israel's largest and most visible environmental hazards," he said.

"All the residents of southern Tel Aviv, the less affluent residents of Tel Aviv, were the ones suffering from that landfill. The smells that came from the mountain [of garbage] and the poor image that the residents suffered – you can't disconnect the environmental problem with the social aspect of that problem."

Five years ago, Mohadav explained, the Israeli government decided to shut down the landfill and had ideas about what they were going to do with the space. Eventually, they decided to turn the area into a huge metropolitan park.

Because the park was slated for the area, there was heavy interest for developers to begin construction there to increase the density around Tel Aviv.

"We fought that intention, we fought the real estate developers, and we backed up the government…By the way, we won a unanimous approval. It was amazing. The national planning council for Israel all voted for the park and they all came out of that meeting with high spirits and that never happens."

For Mohadav this was a victory in two ways. Not only was he able to achieve his goal of turning a dump into a park, but he was able to get average citizens to act to elicit change.

"The residents around the park in Tel Aviv rallied for the park. For us, it was six years of strategy materializing."

He added that environmentalists need to learn to be more accessible to the little guys.

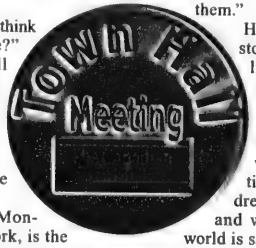
Author David Bornstein is much less pessimistic about the state of the world than the majority of his audience at a recent Toronto event.

"How many people here think the world is getting worse?" he asked at a Town Hall meeting on "How to Change the World," which was sponsored by The Canadian Jewish News at the Barbara Frum Library. Most of the 60 or so people there raised their hands.



Bornstein, a native of Montreal now based in New York, is the author of How to Change the World: Social Entrepreneurs and the Power of New Ideas.

Avrum Rosensweig, founder of Ve'ahavta – The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, who also spoke at the meeting, "embodies the stories" that Bornstein chronicled in his book, said CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat, who moderated the event.

Bornstein, who will be speaking again in Toronto at a Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) event June 16, outlined several little-known stories, including that of the Grameen Bank, the subject of his first book. The Bangladeshi institution pioneered the concept of "micro-credit," lending small amounts of money to poverty-stricken women.

David Bornstein and Avrum Rosensweig

Typically, the loans – in the order of $70 to $80 a year, to be repaid at the rate of $1 to $2 a week – would finance the purchase of a cow or rickshaw, which allowed the borrowers to move to "much less oppressive poverty." That way their families could have three meals a day instead of one or two, could have a tin roof over their house, would be able to grow vegetables (thus improving their nutrition), and could send their daughters to school, he said.

Since 1991, when Bornstein first went to Bangladesh, the number of borrowers dealing with the bank has grown from 500,000 to 4.5 million. Also, he noted, the idea of micro-credit has spread to more than 3,000 organizations in 100 countries.

"More than 70 million families are now benefiting from this idea."

The Grameen Bank was started not by government, but by a person, Bornstein said. "I came to understand that this person was what I call a social entrepreneur, a person who has all the qualities of an entrepreneur, but instead of building a business to generate profit builds an organization to solve social problems."

In his travels to places like India, Poland, South Africa and Brazil, Bornstein interviewed 100 social entrepreneurs and found that they are "springing up like wildflowers. There are literally hundreds of thousands of new organizations being started every year... and we never hear about them."

He said if people heard more stories like that of Jeroo Billimoria – an Indian woman who founded an organization to help street children, which has spread to 55 cities across India – "it would affect the conversations we have with our children, the careers we choose, and whether we feel that the world is safe or not."

Bornstein, a former computer programmer, said that if he were graduating today he would want to work with social entrepreneurs. The growing field also offers "a great opportunity" for retirees to contribute.

His aunt, who started a referral centre for fellow residents of her large New York apartment complex at age 77, is an inspiration to him, he said. At age 91, she is still involved with the project.

Rosensweig, a native of Kitchener, Ont., and the son of a rabbi, said he learned from his parents the importance of reaching out to the stranger. "I was brought up in a household where our door was always open to other people.

"We have to figure out why so many people are not taking the responsibility to make the world change," he said. "It's a very tough question."

At Ve'ahavta, he said, he has "the great honour of walking through the front door of my office every day, and dealing with the good side of humankind."

He admits he doesn't know whether evil can be eradicated. "But I do know that the louder the voice of goodness is, the weaker the voice of evil will be."

Rosensweig said there's no question in his mind that "if we make a decision to change the world, stop the war in Sudan, solve the problem of homelessness, that we would come up with that solution. The question is, do we have the will to do it?"

Gone with the Grodtizinskys

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

One of the more durable myths of Jewish genealogy is the notion that names were commonly changed at Ellis Island or – in the Canadianized version – at Pier 21 in Halifax.

Despite what Great Aunt Sophie once told you, surnames rarely underwent transformation at Ellis Island or Pier 21. Immigration officers at both sites usually worked from written lists of arrivals compiled by ships' pursers. Perhaps they occasionally smoothed over the orthography of a difficult name, but they otherwise left the Cherkofskys, Horodetskys and Lazerovitches alone.

Roots & Remembrance

Canadian officials recorded immigrant names with particular care, knowing that aliens wishing to become citizens were required to apply for naturalization under the exact name used upon landing. At least until 1945 and probably until much later, federal officials routinely checked landing records of naturalization applicants.

In Ontario, people wishing a legal change of name were required to publish their intentions in the Ontario Gazette and elsewhere; submit affidavits listing birth, marriage, mother's maiden name, immigration and other personal details to the provincial court; then go before a judge to make it legal. While much of this paperwork has regrettably been destroyed, some still exists, for example in the York County Matter Files that are accessible through the Ontario Archives.

These files preserve background documentation for hundreds of name changes after 1939. Even when the files were destroyed, judges' order books retain an abridged record of the proceedings.

The following name changes are among many recorded in these musty handwritten judicial volumes from the 1940s:

Abramovitz to Abrams; Applebaum to Allen; Barenbaum to Barron; Bernstein to Burns; Bloomin to Brown; Blumenthal to Allan; Birenbaum to Ferguson; Borinsky to Borins; Borisofsky to Barris.

A love affair with Kensington

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the Sephardi community in Canada. This article is part of a series chronicling the community's early days in Toronto.

There were, of course, supermarkets. These at first fascinated the newcomers: orderly isles of neatly stacked shelves containing a seemingly endless variety. Packaged foods were truly a novelty; frozen foods were an outright wonder. Clean fruits and vegetables, some of which came on foam trays and were covered in plastic wrap. Spices in bottles. But the novelty quickly wore thin.

Through A Sephardi Window

One of the major adjustments for any immigrant is in diet. Speak to anyone who has moved from one country to another and you will not hear the end of his nostalgia. The food here is tasteless, the vegetables don't begin to compare to those "back home." Where can we even get our hands on fruit that tastes and smells like fruit? We took so much for granted…

Compounding matters for the Moroccans, indeed all expatriate Mediterraneans, including Italians, Greeks and Portuguese, was the very British nature of Canada in the '50s.

This was a time when being Canadian meant just that. The immigrant invasion was small and insignificant. In those days, spice meant salt and pepper, a walk on the wild side was perhaps salt and vinegar. Condiments consisted of ketchup, mustard and sweet relish. The spices and herbs that were the flavour staples of the Mediterranean were expensive and hard to come by in Canada.

Where an assortment of freshly caught fish was once daily fare, in Canada fish meant one thing, and one thing alone – a non-descript, white fish, deep fried in batter and served with a side of fries. Fish and chips to the immigrants were all the rage, literally!

Meats too were difficult to obtain. True, there were plenty of kosher butchers, but they sold only muscle meat and perhaps a bit of liver. Moroccans, like Europeans, were also accustomed to organ meat: tongue, brains, lungs, tripe. Here, all such items were not considered fit for human consumption. All were rendered into dog and cat food.

To save the day, the newcomers rediscovered Kensington Market, which, to this day, remains the alternate food market of Toronto. It has catered to wave after wave of immigrants – Russian and Polish Jews, Portuguese, Italians, Asians and Africans.

The Moroccans' love affair with the market is legendary. It so reminded them of their shopping experiences back home that they renamed the market "la plasa de Spadina." It was noisy and crowded. Its outdoor stalls were laden with all their familiar foods, so bizarre to most Canadians, from Artichokes to Zucchini, with plenty of olives in between. The pungent aroma of spices mixed with the consuming smell of fresh fish. Salted cod sides hung on strings. Cages of live chickens, ducks and pigeons were piled right on the sidewalk. Even the butcher shops sported sawdust on their floors and legions of flies crammed the air. Home at last.

Women would happily ignore the sterile neighbourhood supermarkets and ride the streetcars bound for Kensington, where they would buy their weekly groceries.

Coming home, however, was another story. These women would now carry with them laughable numbers of groceries bags, sacks of potatoes and onions, and gallon tins of olive oil. Again they would ride the streetcars, buried under their shopping. Properly gloved Canadian ladies would shake their heads and pity them. Exhausted immigrant ladies would beam with satisfaction and plan feasts for their families. No other scene could more effectively brand them as new immigrants. But they did not care.

Jewish Life

An attack on fundamentalist religion

The Sins of Scripture* by John Shelby Spong, HarperCollins.

The author of this controversial and contentious attack on fundamentalist religion – Jewish and Christian – has been the object of shocking invective. He has been called heretical, a betrayer of the faith, an iconoclast and an unbeliever.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Some of his previous books – Why Christianity Must Change or Die, Rescuing the Bible from Fundamentalism, and Role of Women in a Male Dominated Church – have incensed traditional believers who regard him as a notorious firebrand and renegade.

Until his retirement in 2000, Spong was the Episcopal bishop of Newark, N.J., and was then called to teach at Harvard University.

In The Sins of Scripture, Spong asserts that the Bible contains pernicious texts that cannot be attributed to God. Unhappily, they have been used through the centuries to justify oppression, violence, hatred and discrimination against women, homosexuals, Jews, children, and the environment. With prophetic vigour, Spong lays bare the evil done by the people wielding these texts like weapons in the name of God. He also calls the Christian community to accountability for its long and sad history of violence and hatred toward those it has deemed as "the other."

For example, the familiar text in Genesis, "Be fruitful and multiply… and have dominion over the earth and all of its creatures" has been used to stamp out birth control and to justify the subjugation of the earth and the right to its unlimited exploitation. These objectives, he fears, are nothing less than a "a prescription for human genocide."

Spong is taken aback, even alarmed at the concerted attack against homosexuals, who are viewed by conservative Bible-quoting Christians as the scourge of the earth.

He asserts that overwhelming scientific and medical knowledge exists today pointing to an inescapable conclusion – sexual orientation is not a moral choice. It is something to which people awaken. "It is therefore not morally culpable… Can anyone imagine a church preserving its unity by tolerating slavery in its midst? Is there any difference between that situation and tolerating homophobia? Any prejudice based on who a person is, his or her very being as a child of God, cannot be a part of the church's life."

The Bible has been used by literalists to subjugate women as inferior and second-class human beings, to support slavery, justify the Crusades and the infamous Inquisition.

Anti-Jewish passages in the Bible have been used through the ages to foment hatred. The clear message portrayed in the gospels is that Jews are negative, sinister, anti-Christian characters who were responsible for the death of Jesus. That is the definition that has emerged from the Bible to infiltrate the minds of 2,000 years of Christian history. Far more people than Christians today seem to understand that to call the Bible the "word of God" in any sense is to legitimize this systemic hatred reflected in its pages.

In several chapters that describe the formation of the Hebrew scriptures, the author concludes that "the inspiration of the Bible is not found in its tales of supernatural occurrences and transforming miracles, narratives that speak of divine intervention or fulfilled prophecy. Its inspiration lies rather in those parts of this epic that probe the inner recesses of the human heart and tell us something about who we are, what our values are and what it means to touch the holy. In its pages, we listen to the wisdom of the ages even in its dated forms, in search of meaning, transcendence, and ultimately God."

What Spong offers to readers is a kind of spiritual humanism: "No one holds a corner on the market of salvation. There is no one way into God that all must follow if they hope to survive. There is, however, an ultimate reality beyond all human religious traditions. We call that reality God, and into that reality all religious systems must journey."

Spiritual home improvement

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"We gently and consciously enter the sacred space of our homes sh'ma v'ahavta, loving and listening, placing a kiss full of our loving intentions upon that little box, called a mezuzah, on the doorpost." (Rabbi Goldie Milgram) [http://tinyurl.com/9wgo7]

It is one of the most obvious signs of a Jewish home – an ornate box on the doorpost containing the mezuzah parchment. If you're in the middle of some home improvements, now is the ideal time to look at a spiritual fixer upper – your mezuzot.

The commandment for the mezuzah can be found in the Torah: "And thou shalt write them upon the doorposts of thy house and upon thy gates." (Deuteronomy 6:4-9 and 11:13-21) [http://tinyurl.com/crlhb]

The Jewish Virtual Library points out "the mezuzah is not, as some suppose, a good-luck charm, nor does it have any connection with the lamb's blood placed on the doorposts in Egypt. Rather, it is a constant reminder of God's presence and God's commandments." [http://tinyurl.com/9zv9l]

The mezuzah must be hand-written by an ordained sofer, a trained scribe, onto parchment made from a kosher animal. If you have any doubts about your current mezuzot, a sofer should be consulted to verify that they are kosher. Although the mezuzah text is far shorter than what is found in Torah, the laws are complex. There are 22 lines, 713 letters and 4,649 laws governing the writing of each mezuzah by a sofer. [www.milechai.com/judaism/mezuzah.html]

Stories are legion about people who have purchased a mezuzah only to find out that it is riddled with mistakes. And unfortunately, sometimes the mistakes are not innocent. Mezuzot printed on paper rather than written on parchment are sold to unsuspecting consumers. Sometimes scribes take shortcuts that drastically cut the time needed to write a mezuzah but also result in inferior products. The Israel-based Vaad Mishmereth STaM was established to "promote the halachic integrity of scribal arts" by certifying reliable sofrim. [www.shemayisrael.co.il/orgs/stam/]

When you are ready to affix a kosher mezuzah to your doorpost, you can find the basic instructions online. [http://tinyurl.com/e3gym] But the laws applying to mezuzot can get quite complicated. For example, what do you do with an irregularly shaped door or archway? What happens if you are entering a tiny room? What if you're afraid that your outdoor mezuzah will be stolen? The Halacha-Yomi archives offer a detailed look at the laws of mezuzah based on an English translation of the definitive Kitzur Shulchan Aruch. [http://tinyurl.com/9blzt]

There are many places where you can buy mezuzah parchments and cases online. Whether you decide to buy the parchment from a local store or through the Internet, make sure that you are dealing with work done by a reputable scribe and reliable company. You can find a long list of commercial mezuzah links at MavenSearch's Judaica section. [http://maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=138]

We all know that mezuzot need to be affixed to doors. But did you know you can also get mezuzot for windows? Actually, make that "Windows." Download eMezuzah onto your computer and you'll find a familiar little brown box with the letter "shin" wedged onto the top right-hand corner of your screen. When you pay for the program, it will even recite the Shema to you. [www.scs-intl.com/emuz/]

Do you think that you can spot an invalid mezuzah? Take a look a copy of an error-free mezuzah online. [http://tinyurl.com/ctfn9] And then take the mezuzah challenge. According to the site, this one has 22 mistakes – one on each line. (Just one error will disqualify a real mezuzah.) The scribe Mordechai Pinchas has digitally doctored a mezuzah to contain a mistake on every single one of its 22 lines. After you examine it, you can contact him and he'll send you a list of the errors. [http://tinyurl.com/8wm6k]

But don't think you're going to be the first person to discover all the mistakes. That honour goes to "a visitor from Mexico, Aldo Zamudio, who found every error." The sofer goes on to explain that he was most impressed with Zamudio's abilities. "It is a great example of knowledge crossing all barriers" because Señor Zamudio isn't Jewish.

Bar mitzvah boy honours Righteous Gentile

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Josef Pacula, who was honoured by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations, played a prominent role at Ira Nightingale's recent bar mitzvah at Shaar Sholom Synagogue.

Quite simply, Ira told his guests, he is here because of the actions of Pacula and his family.

His grandmother, "Bubbie Frances" Nightingale, was hidden for more than two years by the Pacula family in Poland during World War II, Ira said.

"If he and his family had not acted, my late bubbie would not have survived, and if not her, then not my father, and not me."

Ira Nightingale

Ira, whose brother Josh honoured a child who was murdered during the Holocaust before celebrating his bar mitzvah, said in his dvar Torah, that "honouring the dead is a mitzvah, but I feel that bestowing honour on the person who is indirectly responsible for my being here before you today is equally important."

He said his father, Howard, had travelled to Poland in 2001 to meet the family that saved his mother.

"When he asked Josef why his family risked a certain death to hide my grandmother, [Josef] said, 'I was deeply moved by her misfortune. She couldn't count on anyone. Her compatriots were being pursued and killed. I couldn't live peacefully knowing this. I believe no one could, but the fear was paralyzing the people.'"

Howard said, "My mother had kept in touch with the family, of whom Josef is the last surviving member, and continued to send them money until she died. I have decided to do the same."

He said that in preparation for Josh's bar mitzvah about three years ago, they twinned him with the young boy after reading on a website, www.jewishgen.org, about a bar or bat mitzvah twinning program in Montreal.

"We would like this [recognition of a good deed] to be an adjunct to the twinning program. It fulfils the tradition of hakarot hatov, searching out of goodness.

"My mother had a big influence on Ira's life, and he felt that this linked him to her."

Media take note of Syrian shenanigans

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

As the United States continues to prod the Arab world toward democratic reform, the Western media are taking a break, with some exceptions, from their intense focus on Israel to report on the changes (some progressive, some regressive) taking place in Iraq, Syria, Lebanon and Egypt. (Of course, we can expect media attention to return substantially as Israel's disengagement from Gaza and northern West Bank settlements in August nears.)

The Feb. 14 assassination of Lebanon's former prime minister Rafik Hariri, the enormous street protests against Syrian occupation, and Syria's subsequent troop withdrawal have all received much coverage. This shows that the media will go where a story is hot and accessible, something that's not always possible in the countries surrounding Israel.

On June 2, Sami Qassir, a well-known journalist and staunch critic of Syria, was assassinated in Beirut. In Lebanon, the act was widely attributed to Syrian agents, as was the Hariri killing. Qassir's murder re-focused media attention not only on Lebanon but also on the possibility that Damascus is continuing to play a strong behind-the-scenes role in Lebanese affairs.

The June 5 election sweep by Hezbollah and Amal, the two major Shiite parties dominant in Lebanon's south (they took 23 seats in the 128-seat parliament) attracted substantial attention. So has Hezbollah's refusal to disarm as required by UN Security Council Resolution 1559. Hezbollah and Amal remain firmly pro-Syrian.

Another story that received some notice was Syria's test-firing of several Scud missiles that left debris in farmers' fields in Turkey. Israel monitored the firing, which Syria denied. Even more media reported on Syria's crackdown on dissidents and human rights activists who were thrown into jail just prior to a three-day Baath Party congress that began on June 5. Analysts see these recent acts as signs of desperation by a regime losing control.

In the "Damascus Spring" of 2000, Syrian President Bashar Assad promised to initiate reforms to the ossified, repressive regime he inherited from his father Hafez. Bashar never delivered. While a few journalists have been overly sanguine about Bashar "the reformer," others have been blunt in their description of him and his regime.

On June 2, the Globe and Mail's Paul Koring wrote about the death in Syria of Kurdish cleric Sheikh Machouk Alkhaznawi, a proponent of reform and a thorn in the side of authorities. It is widely believed that he was murdered weeks ago by Syrian security after being abducted. "The cleric understood the dangers of challenging the brutal Syrian regime," Koring wrote. "President Bashar Assad has tried to put a cherubic stamp on the authoritarian state he inherited from his iron-fisted father… but the grim reality remains that Syria is a brutish, totalitarian state."

Trained to be an ophthalmologist in England, Bashar came back to Syria five years ago on the promise of reforming a moribund economy and backward technological infrastructure. As the founder of the "Syrian Computer Society," Bashar signalled an intent to modernize the state's tightly controlled Internet infrastructure.

Instead, as Megan Stack of the Los Angeles Times wrote on June 7 from Damascus, Bashar used the occasion of a meeting of the congress to avoid reform and rail against modern technology as a threat to Arab identity. "Assad's tirade against technology came as a surprise" she noted. She quoted Bashar on the effects of computers and technology: "[They have] overwhelmed Arabs and threatened their existence and cultural identity, which has increased the doubts and skepticism in the minds of young Arabs."

* * *

For the record: In her introduction to Martin Himel's June 4 report from Gaza on the plight of a family facing the loss of their home under disengagement, Global News anchor Jill Krop tried to provide some context to Israel's control of Gaza and the West Bank. But she committed a common factual error, saying Israel's "occupation of the territories is illegal under international law." Even though she immediately added "Israel disputes that," the fact is that in international law (as this column often points out), it is fully legitimate for Israel to remain in control of those territories pending peace and security guarantees from its Arab neighbours. That is the meaning – "land for peace" – of UN Security Council Resolution 242, which governs all Arab-Israeli negotiations on the future of the territories.

Don't invest in E. European Jewry, Jerusalem Post editor argues

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Amotz Asa-El doesn't mince words.

The executive editor, columnist and editorial writer of the Jerusalem Post says Jews living in the Diaspora, particularly in wealthy countries, must nurture Jewish life in the rich and free world, not Israel, and definitely not in Germany, Poland, Slovakia or Russia.

"I'm totally opposed to the active resurrection of Jewish life in those European countries," he said in an interview in Halifax prior to speaking to non-Jewish clerics, business and community leaders. Asa-El was on day four of a 10-day Canadian speaking tour sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee.

"Investment of Jewish dollars to build yeshivas and community centres should not be done," he said. "Investment of Jewish dollars should be confined to keep countries like the U.S., Canada, England and Australia alive and thriving."

Asa-El, 46, is Israeli-born. He lost both sets of grandparents in the Holocaust, but he says he doesn't necessarily base his feelings on that.

"My family is from Czechoslovakia and the Czechs had some tolerance of Jews, but I think we should not be helping those other European countries. Yes, we should visit the death camps to commemorate those we lost, but there shouldn't be Jewish life there. Too much happened there."

Asa-El's weekly column, Middle Israel, is widely read. In it, he covers a wide range of topics, from politics to economics.

A graduate of Columbia University's graduate school of journalism and a former foreign correspondent with the San Francisco Chronicle and foreign editor of a weekly Hebrew publication in Israel, he said that Israel will soon have the world's largest Jewish community.

"Our population is now about 5½ million. The U.S. is just above that but shrinking, while Israel expands. Israel is mature economically, with a gross domestic product of $110 billion, so it doesn't need as much aid as it's been getting. And most of that GDP comes from Israel's taxpayers anyway. Foreign aid is miniscule in comparison."

'Investment should be confined to keep countries like the U.S., Canada... alive and thriving'

He continued that "Israel can afford to tell the world that it is 'no longer in the business of you helping us. We are in the business of helping you.'"

He said readers respond positively when he writes of diverting aid out of the country, but there is controversy about his arguments against restoring Jewish life in the four European nations.

Prior to his Halifax stop, Asa-El had media interviews and met community leaders in Toronto, Kingston and Ottawa. He flew from Halifax to Moncton for a talk to an inter-faith group on the importance of Israel to the Jewish People.

He was then scheduled to meet journalists in Montreal, speak at Shabbat services at Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue, and meet Quebec members of Parliament. After another visit to Toronto and stops in Hamilton and London,Ont., he was slated to return to Israel June 8.

"When I speak to a broader audience, I stress that there is a misconception among Western journalists, diplomats and academics that the root of the instability in the Middle East is the Israeli-Arab conflict. That is a symptom."

He said the real problem is the refusal of the region's non-elected leaders to offer their people education, mobility and hope, as well as a share of the riches.

"One quarter of a billion people live in the region," he said. "Israel and the Palestinians are a blip in all that. Because of the despair of the wider population, terror results. For example, 9/11 was created by Arabs deeply disenchanted with everything."

He chastised the world for concentrating on problems in Israel.

"They're obsessed with us, with our little country and its problems. How can you explain why the world ignores far more serious problems only an hour or so away from us, like the quarter billion Arabs in the broader Middle East. And Sudan, with its genocide of a million people, is not afforded anywhere near the attention that Israel gets."

Photojournalist's son blamed for early closure of exhibit

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Officials of the borough of Cote St. Luc/Hampstead/Montreal West blame the intransigent attitude of the son of slain Iranian Canadian photojournalist Zahra Kazemi for the early closure of an exhibition of his mother's works last week at the Eleanor London Public Library.

City councillor Anthony Housefather said Stephan Hachemi categorically refused to discuss any modification of the exhibition, which was of life in Afghanistan, Iran and the Palestinian territories. Housefather described Hachemi as "rude, unreasonable and resistant to dialogue."

The three-member council and the library decided four days after the exhibition was installed on May 30 to remove the five photos of Palestinians from the total of 23 photos on view because it felt they were a "one-sided" portrayal of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

Complaints were also received from "several" borough residents soon after the exhibit opened. By June 6, the entire exhibition was down. It had been scheduled to continue until mid-July to coincide with the second anniversary of Kazemi's death while in Iranian custody.

Hachemi sent a letter to the borough demanding that the exhibition be kept in its entirety or not at all, Housefather said. Efforts by The CJN to reach Hachemi for comment were unsuccessful.

Hachemi has been quoted as saying that pulling the five photos was "scandalous, a discriminatory act, racist, an attack on freedom of the press which violates the spirit and the work of my mother." He has filed a complaint with the Quebec Human Rights Commission.

"This was not the best solution. There are no winners," Housefather said. "We should have been able to sit down with Mr. Hachemi and work out a way of exhibiting his mother's work while being respectful of our residents [the majority of whom are Jewish]... The last thing I want is this to be seen as censoring," said Housefather, who acknowledged the incident has left the impression, from the e-mails he and others received from Quebec, Canada and the United States, that the borough is suppressing free speech or artistic expression and showing disrespect to a woman for whom there is widespread sympathy.

Head librarian Lisa Milner and the councillors, who are all Jewish, agreed that the photos and accompanying text presented an "unbalanced" portrayal of the interaction between Palestinians and Israeli authorities, and were inappropriate alongside photos taken in Afghanistan and Iran.

"There's enough Israel-bashing in the world that we do not have to tolerate it in our library," said borough mayor Robert Libman, who said the way the exhibition was organized "equated" the repression carried out under the Taliban in Afghanistan and the mullahs of Iran with Israel's treatment of the Palestinians.

"We wanted very much to help him with his crusade to find justice for his mother, we wanted to work with him, but there was no possibility of a semblance of diplomatic discussion with him," Libman said.

> 'There is enough Israel-bashing in the world that we do not have to tolerate it in our library'

The council was not aware in advance that the exhibition was going to be mounted, which is normal. The library always arranges its exhibitions independently, but in the past, they have not been political, he said.

According to borough manager David Johnstone, to whom Milner referred questions on the matter, the exhibition was arranged by Robert Hebert, a consultant to the library for 11 years. His contact with Hachemi about the exhibition was made back in October and "the impression was that it would be about women and children in Afghanistan and Iran," Johnstone said.

The actual content of the exhibition was only seen by Hebert about a week before it went up, and Milner did not see the exhibition until June 1 when she returned from vacation, Johnstone said.

A complaint that day from a resident "woke us up," said Johnstone, pointing out that the exhibition contained "a very one-sided" view of the Middle East conflict, and the five photos came down June 3. On June 6, the council supported the librarian staff's decision. (Housefather and the third councillor, Dida Berku, had been in Newfoundland a couple of days earlier for a national municipal officials' conference.)

Johnstone said the borough attempted to explain to Hachemi what had been done, "but he did not wish to talk." Hachemi showed up at Johnstone's office June 6 with a television camera crew and served him with the demand letter, he said.

According to Libman and Housefather, the five photos, while not depicting brutality, conveyed a sense that the Palestinians were living in fear of the Israeli military, but the violence inflicted on Israelis by Palestinians was ignored.

Housefather said he could have lived with the photos, but the narrative that accompanied them was "inflammatory" and "condemnatory" of Israel.

He believes the text was written by Hachemi and did not necessarily reflect the views of Kazemi, who died in July, 2003 in an Iranian prison.

Housefather said Hachemi would not listen to a suggestion of a "counter-balancing" exhibition depicting what the Israelis have suffered during the intifadah. "He wanted exclusivity," he said.

Stephen Scheinberg, chair of Montreal Friends of Peace Now, urged the borough to reconsider and allow the Kazemi exhibition to be shown in full.

Scheinberg, a retired Concordia University history professor, accused the borough of censorship, which he said is "negative, distasteful and undemocratic.

"No one has charged that Kazemi's photos were staged or doctored, only that they were not 'balanced,' meaning that the other side in the Middle East tragedy was not represented."

He suggested that balance could be provided by displaying the horrendous results of suicide bombings, if not concurrently, then after the Kazemi exhibition.

Batter Up Kids teaches children to 'step up' to the plate

By NORENE GILLETZ

Batter Up Kids: Delicious Desserts by Barbara Beery is a delightful, easy-to-follow kid's cookbook, with simple, scrumptious dessert recipes that any kid can make. In this spiral-bound cookbook with a wipe-clean cover, you'll find tasty treats, fruit-based snacks, cakes and cookie recipes, plus a child-sized cloth chef's hat that will transform any ordinary kid into a talented chef!

Batter Up Kids is ideal for beginner culinary experts and even the littlest chefs who can't yet read. The recipes include Flowerpot Ice Cream, Mountains of Mud Pies, Candy-Coated Dragonflies, Pink Princess Cake and Bonkers for Banana Bread. Fun for any occasion, the recipes use inexpensive ingredients and teach children basic cooking techniques and kitchen safety.

The inside front cover teaches children how to "Measure Up!" including the Wet Stuff (liquid ingredients), the Dusty Stuff (dry ingredients) and even How to Measure Brown Sugar and Shortening. On the inside back cover, children will "Learn the Lingo," which includes a list of cooking and baking terms – "Sous-Chef: That's you! A person learning to be a chef."

Barbara Beery teaches about 100 kids a month in her children's cooking school which she founded in 1991 in Austin, Texas. She also has created Batter Up Kits – theme baking kits with durable child-size bakeware, gourmet mixes, a unique recipe and more. For more information, visit www.batterupkids.com.

I firmly believe it is important to get children involved in the kitchen at a very early age. Cooking and baking will help children develop their reading, mathematical and co-ordination skills, while having fun at the same time. Also, if kids help cook it, they'll eat it!

Finding "well-done" cookbooks for kids is always a challenge, but finding kosher ones is almost impossible. The recipes chosen here from Batter Up Kids are perfect for the kosher kitchen. I hope you enjoy preparing these easy, delicious desserts with your kids (or grandkids), at home or at the cottage. Now go "stir up" some sweet memories!

Children's cooking school:

1. Get ready. Push your sleeves back, tie on your apron, wash your hands and make sure your work area is clean and spotless.
2. Now get all of the bowls, utensils and ingredients you will need for the recipe you are going to make. Place them in your work area and make sure you have everything ready.
3. Ask a grown-up to be your chef's assistant.
4. Now it's recipe time! Read through the recipe with your assistant and make sure you both understand what to do.
5. Remember, it is much easier to clean up as you go. Fill a big sink or washtub full of soapy water and get a sponge or washcloth. Wipe up as you go. Put each dish and utensil into the sink after you've finished with it. When your recipe is made, you'll almost have everything cleaned up, too. Easy as pie!
6. Don't forget to thank your grown-up assistant for helping you. Do you know the best way to say thanks? Offer them the first bite of your delicious dessert. With a reward like that, you'll want to help you every time.

A SKILLET FULL OF COOKIES

½ cup white sugar
1 cup brown sugar, packed
1 cup (2 sticks) butter, softened
1 tsp. vanilla
2 eggs
2½ cups flour
1 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. salt
2 cups milk chocolate chips

Preheat oven to 375. In a large bowl, use a mixer to cream together the sugars and the butter until smooth. Beat in vanilla and add eggs, one at a time. Add the flour, baking soda and salt. Mix well. Dough will be stiff. Using a large spoon, stir in the chocolate chips.

Spray a 10-inch skillet (with an ovenproof metal or wooden handle) with nonstick cooking spray. Pat cookie dough into skillet and bake approximately 30 minutes or until the edges are lightly browned. Cool for 15 minutes, then slice. Makes 1 giant cookie, 16 slices.

IGLOO ICE POPS

1½ to 2 cups fresh or frozen raspberries, blueberries, sliced kiwi or strawberries
1 cup apple juice or cranapple juice
3 to 5 tbsp. granulated sugar (to taste)
a tiny pinch of salt
powdered/icing sugar (optional)

Combine all ingredients except powdered sugar in a large bowl. Stir carefully, trying to keep the berries whole. Divide fruit mixture evenly between Popsicle moulds or small paper cups. If using paper cups, cover each cup with a foil square. Poke a hole in the foil and insert a wooden Popsicle stick or the straight end of a plastic spoon. Place ice pops on a cookie sheet and freeze for 3 to 4 hours. Makes 12 to 15 ice pops.

Chef's Secret: For a cool way to serve these pops, sprinkle with "snowflakes" of powdered sugar.

LADYBUGS ON-A-STICK

12 seedless red or green grapes
12 (6- to 8-inch) wooden skewers or colored toothpicks
12 whole strawberries with stems
1 package mini-morsel chocolate chips

Place a grape on a wooden skewer, sliding it all the way to the end of the stick. This is the ladybug's head. Next place the strawberry on the skewer, stem end first, and slide it down to touch the grape. This is the ladybug's body. Lay the ladybug down and carefully push the pointed ends of several chocolate chips into the strawberry to make the ladybug's spots. Now you have a ladybug on-a-stick! Makes 12 ladybugs

Ex-Shin Bet chief backs Gaza pullout

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The former head of the Shin Bet security service supports the disengagement from Gaza and does not believe that it will worsen Israel's security situation, he said.

Avi Dichter disagrees with the prediction made by former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Moshe Ya'alon in an interview published in Ha'aretz, in which Ya'alon said that the disengagement will lead to a renewal of the terrorist war in the West Bank.

"I heard his assessment," Dichter said. "I don't know of intelligence that supports this. I don't know of logic that supports this."

Dichter objects to defining the disengagement as a "flight." He attributes the terrorist organizations' willingness to agree to a lull in violence in the territories to the heavy military pressure applied by Israel, and particularly the assassination of their leaders. He also believes that the threat of Qassam launches at Israel from the Gaza Strip will not be any greater after the IDF leaves Gaza, and that in fact, Israel will have greater freedom for military action if needed, because once the settlements and the IDF are out of Gaza, the number of Israeli targets there will be much smaller.

However, he is worried about emerging security arrangements in the northern West Bank, where four settlements are slated for evacuation. Dichter believes that the IDF must continue to operate in the Jenin area following the pullout, because otherwise, a security vacuum will result, and the terrorist organizations will exploit it.

Despite the difficulties — which, he said, include the likelihood that some right-wing extremists will not hesitate to fire on soldiers and policemen – Dichter believes the disengagement will be implemented. "Extreme scenarios are possible, but the critical mass of the evacuees will resist passively," he said.

"It will be difficult and unpleasant and it isn't going to look good on television, but we'll get through it."

Dichter expects the danger of an attack on the Temple Mount mosques or of an attempt to assassinate Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to increase as the disengagement approaches. He added that he had warned various rabbis from the northern West Bank that any attack on the Temple Mount would result in an unprecedentedly severe wave of terror against Jews around the world.

Ex-Shin Bet chief Avi Dichter

Dichter insists that the Shin Bet's "Jewish department," which tracks Jewish extremists, has better information than is generally thought. "Our intelligence penetration of the extreme right isn't bad," he said. "The problem is that we don't always manage to translate intelligence into legal evidence, and in some cases, revealing the evidence would be liable to burn our sources of information."

Dichter rejected speculation that Sharon decided not to extend his term as Shin Bet chief for a sixth year because he wanted someone less dominant and independent in the post. He insisted that his retirement did not stem from any disagreements with the prime minister, whom he admires. "Far be it from me to give him grades, but to my mind he is a real leader," Dichter said.

UN may investigate reports of Syrian presence in Lebanon

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK – United Nations Secretary General is considering sending a team to Lebanon to investigate reports of continued Syrian intelligence activity there, despite the official withdrawal of Syrian forces from Lebanon last month.

The plan will probably involve the return of the UN team that investigated the circumstances surrounding the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri.

"We are receiving reports that claim that some [Syrian intelligence forces] are still there, and we are weighing the possibility of reinstating our inspection team to see what is happening," Annan said. The secretary general added that UN delegate Terje Roed Larson had been dispatched to Damascus for talks with Syrian President Bashar Assad.

The United States is concerned about the possibility of a "pattern" of political killings in Lebanon, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said last week as two newspapers reported the Bush administration had word of a "Syrian hit list" targeting Lebanese leaders.

"What we don't want is that there is a pattern now of assassination of key figures, because that would be very, very destabilizing in Lebanon, and I think it would have to point a finger at those forces that have been destabilizing in Lebanon," Rice said in an interview on PBS' Charlie Rose show.

Kofi Annan

Hariri was assassinated in February and anti-Syrian columnist Samir Kassir was killed this month in Beirut.

"We need to be very clear that we expect a full investigation of the assassination of Mr. Kassir, following the assassination of Mr. Hariri," Rice said.

The FBI is helping the Lebanese government with its investigation of Kassir's murder. One FBI source said, "When Lebanese sources tell us that after the assassination of Kassir, more will follow, we take it seriously."

Bush administration officials say the United States has received "credible" word that Syria has developed a "hit list" targeting prominent Lebanese political leaders, the New York Times and the Washington Post reported on their webites.

The newspapers cited senior administration officials as saying Syria's plan was aimed at creating instability in an attempt to regain control of Lebanon.

Talk of the Syrian "hit list" has also gathered steam in Lebanon recently, but no one in the government has seen such a list, and there is no evidence attesting to its existence. Intelligence sources said they can't confirm the credibility of the reports.

A UN Security Council resolution in September demanded Syria withdraw all its forces from Lebanon, which were deployed there for 29 years. Damascus did so last month.

Martin acknowledges fate of Jewish refugees

"[Martin] is probably the first western leader to acknowledge the fate of Jewish refugees," Farber said. "He understands the need to find a resolution for this."

Farber was the lone Canadian representative at the meeting convened by the World Association of Jews from Arab Countries (WOJAC) in association with Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC). Delegates from Canada, the United States, Britain, France, Belgium, Italy and Israel attended, while community representatives from Mexico and Australia participated through teleconferencing.

JJAC executive director Stanley Urman said the proposed international advocacy campaign contains two elements, "highlighting the mass violation of human rights versus Jews and their flight as refugees, and cataloguing individual and communal losses."

"We found in some of our research a pattern of orchestrated repression that was mirrored in 10 Arab countries. There were murders, arbitrary detentions and expulsions in all countries," Urman said.

Data provided by JJAC indicate the Jewish population in 10 Arab countries (Iran is not included) in 1948 totalled 856,000. By 2001, the Jewish population in all 10 countries totalled 7,800, of whom 7,200 lived in Morocco and Tunisia.

Algeria's numbers went from 148,000 to zero. Other countries to report having no Jews at all were Aden and Libya. Egypt's ancient community of 75,000 dropped to 100, Iraq's went from 135,000 to 100 and Morocco's 265,000 fell to 5,700.

Two-thirds of today's world Sephardi population resides in Israel, Urman said, and the country's ministry of justice has created a database to collect testimony of refugees and document the assets they were forced to leave behind. So far, Israeli officials have collected the case histories of some 3,000 families.

Urman said he expects the Knesset will proclaim March as "the month of commemoration and collection [of testimony].

"When the time comes when Israel or representatives of communities put the facts on the table [to request restitution], we must have the documents," he said.

Canada could play an important role in pushing for Jewish refugee rights, he continued. "We hope that Canada and others bring to the United Nations the notion there were multiple populations of refugees and it is an injustice to provide rights and redress to one victim population without providing equal rights to the victims of that same conflict," he said.

Sasson Mayer, a retired businessman originally from Baghdad, said he has already filed a claim on behalf of himself and his family with an organization in Jerusalem that represents Iraqi Jews. His family lost their interests in a weaving looms factory and two houses, and they were forced to abandon about 1,000 dinars in a bank account. In addition, his aunt's home in the Bestan al Chas neighbourhood of Baghdad was also lost.

Nevertheless, Mayer is not confident anything will come of his efforts. "I don't believe that Jews – myself – are going to get anything."

Instead, he believes, the claims of Iraqi Jews will be used to balance those of Palestinian refugees, netting them very little.

Farber, however, believes the claims of Jewish refugees should not be linked in that way to Palestinian claims. "Sephardi Jews want their narrative recognized," he said. Arab countries must "recognize the fact these are legitimate Jewish refugees forced to leave their homes and they are due compensation."

In addition, Arab governments should recognize the injustice they perpetrated against their Jewish citizens, many of whom had lived in these countries for thousands of years, he said.

Meanwhile, one of the participants at the Paris meeting, Libyan-born Gina Waldman, said that "over the years it has been difficult to raise the profile of Sephardi Jews throughout the world... This is about telling the stories that have never been told. It is not about money. And some of the stories are very sad."

Waldman recalled fleeing with her family from Tripoli in 1967 as a mob was setting fire to her apartment building.

"A Muslim neighbour saved us," she said. "He convinced the mob to leave. He saved our lives."

She and six family members managed to get to Italy, the former colonial power in Libya, where they lived in one room.

Her father had founded a land development company in Tripoli, which employed more than 300 people when the family fled in 1967.

"He never got over the loss," she said.

Waldman eventually moved to the United States, and she has worked as a human rights activist for many years.

After Sept. 11, she founded Jews Indigenous to the Middle East and North Africa (JIMENA), and has made a film, The Forgotten Refugees.

Most Iraqi Jews won't benefit from plan

A compensation plan for Iraqis wrongfully deprived of real property does not address the rights of most Iraqi Jews, according to an organization representing Jewish refugees from Arab lands.

Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC), a worldwide coalition of major Jewish organizations, said the restitution plan announced last week by the Iraqi Ministerial Council targets Iraqis who lost an interest in property between July 17, 1968, and April 9, 2003, a period that corresponds to a Saddam Hussein-backed coup and runs to the end of his regime.

However, most Iraqi Jews were dispossessed in 1950 and 1951, meaning the plan does not address their rights, said Stanley Urman, executive director of JJAC.

Furthermore, JJAC noted, the deadline for claims is June 30 and they must be filed in Iraq.

JJAC applauded the Ministerial Council initiative, but added some caveats.

"Unfortunately, for members of our community, the [compensation claims] will be very difficult to address due to the limited time and the location for submission of claims," said Maurice Shohet, immediate past president of Congregation Bene Naharayim – an Iraqi congregation in New York.

"While we are encouraged by this development, redress for the mass violations of human rights must apply equally to all Iraqis, irrespective of when these offences took place, irrespective of which Iraqi regime was in power and for all those displaced from Iraq, wherever they may now reside," Urman said.

"It appears that the stage has been set for a new system of justice and the rule of law," added JJAC founding chair S. Daniel Abraham. "We hope that this signals the beginning of a process to rectify historical injustices and discriminatory measures perpetrated by previous Iraqi regimes."

According to an Iraq Property Claims Commission (IPPC) news release, the compensation process "is open to all persons, or their heirs, who have been wrongfully deprived of real property (for example, land, house or an orchard) or an interest in real property (for example, the right to farm the land) because of actions taken by the former governments from July 17, 1968, to April 9, 2003. This process also covers many actions carried out by some officials of the previous governments.

"Claims may also be made by people who lost or will lose real property or an interest in real property between March 18, 2003, and June 30, 2005, as a result of their ethnicity, religion, or sect; or for purposes of ethnic cleansing, or due to the return of individuals who had been previously dispossessed of their property as a result of the former government's policy of property confiscation.

Pope commits to interfaith ties at meeting with Jews

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST — Following what they termed a warm and friendly Vatican audience with Benedict XVI, Jewish leaders are expressing the conviction that Jewish-Catholic relations will broaden and deepen under his pontificate.

"After this meeting, we are confident that under the leadership of Pope Benedict XVI, the Catholic Church will continue to build upon its growing relations with the Jewish community," World Jewish Congress President Edgar Bronfman said in a statement after the audience last week.

The WJC's chair, Rabbi Israel Singer, added that the Church and the Jewish community would co-operate on joint humanitarian initiatives, including "much-needed relief and education aid to Africa, a continent suffering from the plague of AIDS."

The meeting between the pope and a 25-member delegation from the International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations was Benedict's first official audience with international representatives of another faith community.

Rabbi David Rosen, the American Jewish Committee's director of interreligious relations, called the encounter "remarkably warm and the most informal private papal audience I have ever attended."

Participants included representatives from the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform movements; leaders from Israel, North America, Europe and Latin America; the Anti-Defamation League, the American Jewish Committee and B'nai B'rith International.

Benedict, who had met many members of the delegation when he was Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, greeted them as old friends and spoke with them individually about a variety of specific issues.

Rabbi Singer said that he and Bronfman also had a private meeting with the pope in which they briefed him on this week's Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe summit on anti-Semitism and discussed humanitarian projects.

In his formal address to the group, Benedict reaffirmed his commitment to make Jewish-Catholic relations a prominent part of his agenda.

He noted that this year marks the 40th anniversary of Nostra Aetate, a landmark declaration by the Second Vatican Council that opened the door to formal Catholic-Jewish dialogue.

That declaration, he said, affirmed the church's conviction that "the beginnings of her faith are already to be found in Abraham, Moses and the prophets." It also "called for greater mutual understanding and esteem between Christians and Jews and deplored all manifestations of hatred, persecution and anti-Semitism," he said.

"At the very beginning of my pontificate," he said, "I wish to assure you that the Church remains firmly committed, in her catechesis and in every aspect of her life, to implementing this decisive teaching."

Benedict noted that the history of relations between Jews and Catholics has been "complex and often painful," but he stressed that "remembrance of the past remains for both communities a moral imperative."

That imperative, he said, "must include a continued reflection on the profound historical, moral and theological questions presented by the experience of the Shoah."

The German-born Benedict, 78, was elected to the papacy April 19 following the death of Pope John Paul II. The Polish-born John Paul made fostering Jewish-Catholic relations a pillar of his policy.

Both popes clearly felt that "the burden of history rests on their shoulders," said Rabbi Gary Bretton-Granatoor, director of interfaith affairs for the Anti-Defamation League.

It was significant, he said, that at a time when a lot of people "wish the Jewish community would shut up about the past, here is a pope who says that it is a sacred obligation to remember the past and learn from it."

Israel destroys mortars

Israel destroyed Palestinian mortar shell launchers in the Gaza Strip. The attack came a day after three labourers were killed in a Palestinian mortar attack on the Israeli settlement bloc of Gush Katif. Palestinians also fired several mortar rounds at Gush Katif settlements. No injuries were reported in either the Israeli or Palestinian strikes.

Rabbi: Don't refuse orders

Soldiers should not refuse orders to evacuate Gaza settlers from their homes, a former Israeli Sephardi chief rabbi said. "Do not refuse orders," Rabbi Mordechai Eliyahu said, according to Ha'aretz. "It's preferable for believing Jews to go among the houses and" evacuate settlers "while crying in tears and with a broken heart than for all kinds of evil people to come and joyously remove the settlers from their homes," he said in comments broadcast on Israel's Channel Two television. Israel's withdrawal from Gaza is set to begin in mid-August.

Onus on Palestinians: Straw

U.K. Foreign Secretary Jack Straw told Palestinian leaders that the creation of an independent state "was in their hands." In the region for two days of talks in Jerusalem and Ramallah, Straw praised Israel's planned Gaza withdrawal, which he said would provide an opportunity for the Palestinians to prove they could rein in terrorists and make crucial economic reforms. "If this is a success, people will see that the Palestinians are capable of running the beginnings of their own state," he said. "They have the future in their hands." Straw, who also met Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, stressed that allowing terror groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad to operate would undermine the position of the Palestinian Authority and hinder peace prospects.

Gewurz, Cotler honoured

Bar-Ilan University awarded an honorary doctorate to Montreal businessman Samuel Gewurz as part of its jubilee year launch festivities. "We are honouring Samuel Gewurz for his profound involvement in public life and his devotion to the cause of Jewish education in Israel and Canada," said Bar-Ilan president Moshe Kaveh. Bar-Ilan also gave Canadian Justice Minister Irwin Cotler a lifetime achievement award for his contribution to human rights.

Bronfman opposes pullout

Canadian David Bronfman contributed $100,000 to the fight against Israel's upcoming Gaza Strip withdrawal. He made his pledge during a tour of the Neveh Dekalim settlement, Ha'aretz reported. Bronfman's late father, Edward Bronfman of Toronto, was the first cousin of Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress.

4 acquitted in 2002 Kenya hotel bombing

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NAIROBI — A Kenyan judge last week acquitted four men charged in the 2002 suicide bombing of an Israeli-owned hotel that killed 15 people, saying prosecutors failed to link them to the bombers or Al Qaeda.

Kenya High Court Justice John Osiemo said the lack of evidence was such that prosecutors should not have accused the four, who faced 15 counts of murder.

"The prosecution has not established that the four accused people were at the scene of the murder, nor that they had met the two suicide bombers and there was a pre-arranged plan between them and the suicide bombers," Osiemo said.

Three Israelis and 12 Kenyans were killed after two suicide bombers broke through barriers outside the Paradise Hotel with a four-wheel drive vehicle full of explosives on Nov. 28, 2002.

At almost the same time, a missile was fired at, but missed, an Israeli airliner leaving the airport in the nearby Kenyan resort town of Mombasa. Three others have been charged with conspiracy in that case, and a ruling is expected later this month.

So far, no one has been convicted in either case, the most high-profile terror cases in Kenya since the 1998 bombing of the U.S. embassy in Nairobi.

But while three of the men charged with murder were released last week, one, Omar Said Omar, was kept in detention and charged with illegally possessing weapons. He faces from seven to 15 years in jail if convicted.

Prosecutors accused Omar of possessing five light anti-tank weapons, firearms, a hand grenade and forged national identity card, all found in his house in August 2003.

Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda network, which is also blamed for the embassy blast, claimed responsibility for the missile attack and bombing at the hotel, a popular destination for Israeli tourists in Kikambala, north of Mombasa.

Osiemo said there was no evidence connecting the defendants to Al Qaeda, save calls between their mobile phones and that of a still-wanted suspect believed to be a top Al Qaeda member in Kenya.

The defendants, Mohammed Ali Saleh Nabhan, Mohammed Kubwa, Aboud Rogo Mohammed and Omar had denied the charges.

The men plan to sue the government for their long incarceration on the grounds it was unjustified, defence lawyer Amos Ngaira said outside court.

Israel's Foreign Ministry said Kenya's ambassador to Israel will be summoned and told Kenya must do more to bring the guilty to justice, and that Israel is offering further aid in finding them.

"The Foreign Ministry received with dismay the court's decision to release the suspects in the attack on the Paradise Mombasa Hotel. This decision means that until today, none of those guilty for this heinous crime have received punishment," the ministry said in a statement.

"This fact defiles the memory of the victims, Israelis and Kenyans, and raises fears that terror organizations around the world will view this as an encouragement for their vile deeds."

Survivor writes memoir 'for the generations to come'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Sixty years after his liberation from Ebensee work and concentration camp in Austria, Joseph Tenenbaum has an extraordinary memory of even the smallest detail and can reflect on the emotional vicissitudes of his life.

Like many Holocaust survivors, Tenenbaum does not like to speak about the horrors he lived through and the images that float in and out of his memory.

"I wanted to escape from the past, almost pretend it wasn't there. And yet not for a day could I forget it. How can you? With parents, friends, cousins and most of our town killed."

He says memory is a curse. But despite the pain of remembering, Tenenbaum wrote a book titled Legacy and Redemption: A Life Renewed.

"I wrote it for my children and grandchildren and the generations to come."

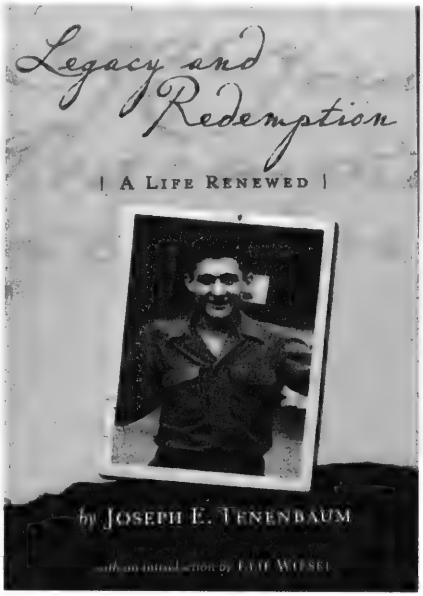
It begins with his pre-World War II memories of his happy and secure childhood growing up in Dzialoszyce, a small town in Poland where peace and love of life prevailed. He tells of the war years and the camps of Plaszow, Mielec, Mauthausen, Melk, Esbensee and others. He also speaks of "surviving the surviving" – rebuilding his broken life to become a successful Canadian businessman and philanthropist.

Despite his devastating experiences, Tenenbaum – who throughout his interview with The CJN quoted Socrates and the Talmud – adds humour and passion to his tale of rebuilding his life with optimism and courage, without succumbing to the urge to be blinded by bitterness.

Of some 950 submissions from Holocaust survivors to the United States Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C., Tenenbaum was one of three authors selected to be published in a series called the Holocaust Survivors Memoir Project. Proceeds from the book will go to the museum, where Tenenbaum attended a signing ceremony last month.

Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel, a longtime friend of Tenenbaum, writes in the introduction to Legacy and Redemption that "survivors tried to express their travails in words. People refused to hear them."

Tenenbaum's life can be segmented into five distinct eras: his happy idyllic childhood surrounded by family and friends; the arrival of the Germans, and the subsequent expulsions, separations and horrors as he reached bar mitzvah age; Tenenbaum as an 18-year-old survivor who becomes self-educated; Tenenbaum as a militant Zionist fighting for and building the State of Israel; and the challenge of establishing a new life – with marriage, children, making a living and becoming active in the community.



His accounts of becoming involved with the Irgun group in Germany and Italy after the war and of organizing illegal immigration to Palestine give a historical perspective on the struggle to establish the State of Israel.

Asked why he wrote the book, Tenenbaum replied: "The book wrote me."

He said he was first asked by his daughter in the mid-1970s to come to her class at the Associated Hebrew Schools to speak to the students and teachers about his experiences.

"It was with great trepidation that I went. When I thought about John Beattie, who started with small demonstrations with a small group at Allen Gardens, and other Holocaust deniers like Ernst Zundel, I realized that I must testify before those bastards contaminate the world to finish what Hitler started."

He began his remembrances by writing a letter to his children.

"It is said that thou shalt tell the children and the children will tell other children. So I started to write Bereshit – in the beginning. It was my legacy to them. And then the book wrote me."

He says he was determined that although the Nazis had stripped away their prisoners' names and replaced them with numbers, "they could not strip me of my dignity, my soul."

Tenenbaum's memory for names and events is awesome, and he is adamant that that we cannot let the past go.

"By writing, I bring the reader into the world to understand and know what I and many survivors could not speak about for a very long time."

Tenenbaum, who is frequently invited to speak to groups, sees his book as a warning.

"I wanted people to know that this could happen here, or any place, any time. About Amalek [the nation in the Bible that attacked the Israelites in the desert], it is written to remember and don't forget. They are two distinct things – to remember and never forget.

"With my parents gone, the only thing that kept me alive was working for Palestine, smuggling people out to settle there. I had to excavate my youth and put it back on the agenda."

His philosophy in life, he says, is to achieve balance. "This led me to… fall in love, get married, have children and to strive for a life of normalcy."

The first printing of Legacy and Redemption: A Life Renewed sold out and the book is being reprinted. It's available at Jewish bookstores and at the Holocaust Museum in Washington.

Names in the News: British authors Helen Davis and Douglas Davis were in town last week, promoting their recent coffee-table book Israel in the World, which celebrates Israel's extraordinary high-tech achievements in medicine, science and technology, agriculture and other areas.

Although the Davises have lived for many years in Israel, where Douglas was senior editor of the Jerusalem Post, the pair say that collecting some of the country's high-tech success stories was an eye-opening experience. "Even we were surprised when we wrote the book," said Helen. "Our problem was not how to fill a book but how to avoid filling 10."

According to Douglas, even Israelis are often amazed to learn the extent of the country's achievements in the high-tech field. "One of the most common reactions is bewilderment, and surprise and delight," he said. The Davises were in Toronto for one day before proceeding to a book launch in New York headlined by newspaper mogul Rupert Murdoch, who penned the book's introduction.

Israeli family lives in 'bubble' in Quebec art gallery

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Alma, a pulp-and-paper town of 26,000 in the Saguenay-Lac St. Jean region about 200 kilometres north of Quebec City, is known for the scenic wilderness that surrounds it and not for its interior spaces.

But an Israeli family is changing that with the world-premiere of "The Bubble," a room-sized installation art exhibition, the centrepiece of which is a "home" encased in transparent fibreglass, on view at the Langage Plus Centre d'Art Actuel until June 19.

Bella Noviski and Evyator Stern, and children Danielle, 20, and Yonatan, 14, entered the bubble June 9 and were to live there for three days.

Its exterior is like a one-way mirror: spectators could see everything that goes on inside, but the family couldn't see out at all. A webcam also allowed anyone with Internet access to follow their every move live.

They were only allowed to leave the bubble to use the washroom (there are no showers), and even then they were to wear isolation suits and gas masks. The idea was that they would be completely cut off from the external environment. Call it the ultimate in cocooning.

Otherwise, they tried to live as normally as possible, just as they would back home in Herzliya. It wasn't an act.

They had e-mail access and visitors could interactively correspond with them. Having lived in Paris for 10 years, the couple are fluent in French.

The bubble measures eight by four metres and is 2.5 metres high. Air comes in through holes on top, and there is no mechanical ventilation.

The couple were designing and constructing the bubble for the past year. It was dismantled to be brought to Canada, and the family spent a week in Alma reassembling it on-site. They carried it with them on the long bus journey from Montreal to Alma. It was furnished and decorated to resemble a normal home, with materials procured locally. They didn't have to cook, as food was catered.

While on view, the family sorted photos and looked at videos of themselves taken over the years, and discussed their relationship. The activity was intended to suggest that families like to look at their past through rose-coloured glasses, while the present, which is on view, is a little more complicated.

So what's it all about?

The couple, who are established artists in Israel and have exhibited frequently in Europe, said "The Bubble" is inspired by the desire of families everywhere to shelter themselves from the outside world. But these boundaries are actually fragile and provide a false protection from the danger that is always just a stone's throw away from people in glass houses.

In the room with the bubble are monitors that play two video loops: one taken inside a public bus in Israel on an ordinary day, and another of cows grazing placidly. Although nothing happens, Stern said these scenes convey a sense of dread in the case of the bus, and of eerie silence following a catastrophe in the case of the cows.

The couple encourage viewers to interpret the installation in their own way. They emphasize it is not a cri de coeur against terrorism or a political statement. Although Israel's foreign ministry provided logistical help, the couple did not receive any government assistance for the project.

Yet, the violence in Israel of the past 4½ years and the Iraq war have strongly influenced them. "People have been afraid to go out of their homes or to get on a bus," Noviski said. "The Bubble" suggests the "escapism" that enables Israelis to endure an ever-present threat.

"To survive mentally, we have to live in some kind of bubble."

Of course, they realized beforehand that they were exposing themselves to something different in Alma: the critical eyes of strangers. The lack of privacy did not overly concern the family. If they argued among themselves, so be it. They are making art, not propaganda for some ideal of family life, they said.

"This is a reality show. The only difference with those on television is that ours will not be edited," said Noviski.

"To survive mentally, we have to live in some kind of bubble," says artist Bella Novisky, pictured with husband Evyatar Stern and children Danielle and Yonatan.

Yonatan, who wears his hair in long dreadlocks, sees the whole thing as a fun experience. "My friends are jealous of me," he said.

Danielle, who is on leave from the army, was more blasé. "We grew up under an artistic influence. This kind of idea is not unusual to us."

Speaking before the show's opening, they said they weren't worried about going a little stir crazy. "We'll see. It'll be like in a laboratory," Stern said with a shrug.

The family will remain in Alma until the end of the exhibition and be available to discuss it with visitors.

The connection between the Israelis and the Alma gallery was made through Quebec artist Michele Heon, whom Noviski met when she was completing a PhD at the University of Paris VIII in the 1990s.

This is the family's first time in Canada, and when interviewed in Montreal before the start of the exhibit, they had only a vague idea of where Alma was or what the area is like.

Langage Plus gave the artist couple "carte blanche" to create whatever work they wished. As director Christine Martel explained, the nonprofit, artist-run gallery encourages avant-garde and experimental art. Since its founding in 1979, it has hosted many international artists, but Novisky and Stern are the first from Israel.

"'The Bubble' fits well with our mandate. We are very enthusiastic," she said. The couple say "The Bubble" represents a blending of their principal artistic interests, and is the first time they have collaborated like this since meeting as students at Jerusalem's Bezalel Academy of Art in the 1980s. Both are primarily sculptors working in large formats.

She has always been interested in portraying domestic life and everyday themes. His work has been more political and influenced by Israel's history and current events. His parents were Holocaust survivors, and he aroused some controversy when a work about the Lebanon war incorporated crematoria.

"It broke a taboo in Israel about using Holocaust imagery," he said.

"The Bubble" sparked interest in Israel even before the family left. They were the subject of a feature in Ha'aretz and are to be interviewed by TV talk-show host Yair Lapid when they return.

"The Bubble" is scheduled to be shown at Singapore's Modern Art Museum next February.

Artist looks for moments that transcend time

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Looking for imagery that combines present with past, Barry Oretsky shoots close to 30 rolls of film on each of his frequent trips to Europe.

If Oretsky can later transcribe one or two pictures from each roll into a painting, then he considers himself lucky. His current show, "Observations," at Gallery One brings together 13 of those lucky moments into a gathering of high realism artwork that transcends time.

The Children's Case is one of Barry Oretsky's paintings that form part of a Holocasut series that waits unfinished in his basement.

Many of the paintings, which vary from still lifes to window displays, use reflections to force the viewer into the scene. In the time that it takes to analyse the work, Oretsky hopes that a cognitive and emotional understanding will emerge, so that it becomes clear what made the artist pause and snap his picture.

"You have these strange juxtapositions that take place in reflections," Oretsky said, explaining that with a reflection you're looking peripherally and the experience becomes non-threatening. When the viewer is more willing to engage, they look long enough that the image makes sense on a deeper level.

Oretsky's reflective The Sacred Feminine is on display at Gallery one.

While his paintings celebrate the beauty of the human experience, he also isn't afraid to look into the abyss. While "Obervations" is on exhibit in downtown Toronto, the artist talks about a Holocaust series that waits unfinished in the basement of his uptown home.

For Oretsky, the Holocaust paintings represent a totally different aspect to his personality. "Any Jew of 58 years of age knows about the Holocaust," he said, adding that the Shoah has affected him tremendously his whole life.

Oretsky grew up in Owen Sound listening to stories of the war and then later served in the Israeli army.

"I'm always aware that I have to be prepared to defend myself as a Jew," he said. "That awareness forces me to explore the dark as well as light sides of my soul."

"You can't have light without dark. The dichotomy is always there. Otherwise, both sides suffer," he said.

The artist reflects on the importance of remembering the Holocaust at a time that the world is trying to put the Shoah behind.

"They're trying to disengage from the moral responsibility to be cognizant of the lessons of the Holocaust. They think it's an old story," he said.

For many years, Oretsky refused to travel to Germany. However, after his mother died, he decided to visit Auschwitz in order to pray Shacharit, the morning services. While there, he shot two rolls of film. Once he got home, he realized there were 10 photos, a minyan, which could be transformed into paintings. Two of those shots, Chaim and The Children's Case, are already complete. Oretsky is hoping to find a patron who will buy the complete minyan before it is finished so that he can work on the rest uninterrupted.

In the meantime, Oretsky's technique continues to evolve so that his command of colour and stroke allow him the freedom to capture imagery that prompted him to stop and pause as he walked the streets of Paris and Rome.

Oretsky's "Observations" runs to June 29 at Gallery One, 121 Scollard St., Toronto.

Documentaries focus on the Jews of Iraq and Iran

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Political instability and rabid nationalism have had devastating consequences on the venerable Jewish communities of Iraq and Iran. Two thoughtful documentaries screened at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival, The Last Jews of Baghdad and Jews of Iran, underscore that theme.

Carole Basri's vivid film on Iraq – the third in a trilogy about its former Jewish inhabitants – charts the decline and dissolution of the ancient Jewish community from the 1930s onward. It ends on the eve of the 2003 allied invasion of Iraq, when Baghdad was home to only about 50 Jews.

Her overarching point is that Jews prospered under British colonial rule and sustained a loss of confidence and influence after Iraq nominally achieved its independence in 1932. Iraq had technically liberated itself from the shackles of colonial domination, but behind the scenes, Britain pulled the strings.

Jews, nevertheless, were dismissed from government jobs and limits were placed on the number of Jewish university students. It was a far cry from the days when many banks and shops in Baghdad were closed on the sabbath.

A clique of pro-Nazi Iraqi army officers, backed by German aircraft, staged a coup in the late spring of 1941. The plotters were crushed and fled in disarray. But after the failure of their revolt, there was a momentary power vacuum during which Arab mobs attacked Baghdadi Jews in a pogrom known as the farhud. Saddam Hussein's uncle was one of the perpetrators.

The British looked on impassively as approximately 200 Jews were murdered and 2,000 were wounded. Jewish women were raped and the homes of Jews were looted and destroyed. But as Basri hastens to add, some Iraqis came to the aid of Jews.

The farhud shattered the poise of Iraqi Jewry and prompted several thousand Jews to emigrate. There was a period of calm, but it was broken by the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan. Within a year, Iraq unveiled a series of draconian anti-Jewish measures.

Jewish-owned banks were forbidden to hold foreign currency, Jewish newspapers were shut, Jews were forced to pay a special tax for Palestinian losses in the Arab-Israeli war, Jews were barred from some jobs and a prominent Jewish businessman was hanged, accused of being a Zionist.

Although emigration was illegal, Jews began leaving in droves, aided by smugglers. By 1949, 12,000 had left. In 1950, the Iraqi government passed legislation allowing Jews to leave on condition they relinquished their citizenship. The upshot of it all was that 120,000 Jews immigrated to Israel. Iraq proceeded to nationalize their property.

This Iranian-Jewish student was maligned by her teacher who called her "impure."

Ten thousand Jews remained in Iraq. They were economically better off than their struggling cousins in Israel. According to Basri, Iraqi Jews enjoyed a good life, even after the violent overthrow of the monarchy in 1958.

Almost 5,000 Jews lived in Iraq when the 1967 Six Day War broke out. They were subjected to harsh restrictions. "Wherever we went, we were watched," says one Jew.

Worse was yet to come. In January 1969, nine Jews who had been charged with being Israeli spies were hanged in central Baghdad. A national holiday was declared as 700,000 Iraqis filed passed the dangling corpses. "They were traitors, like the Rosenbergs," claims Iraqi government flack Tariq Aziz.

In the aftermath of this tragic event, two more Jews were executed and the son of Iraq's chief rabbi was imprisoned and tortured. The rabbi himself was trotted into a television studio and compelled to issue a statement attesting to the good treatment of Jews in Iraq.

With the help of Kurdish smugglers, an additional 3,500 Jews escaped from Iraq in the intervening years. There were 1,000 Jews in Iraq when Saddam Hussein – the orchestrator of the 1969 hangings – assumed the presidency in place of Ahmed Hassan al-Bakr in 1979. They, too, eventually fled. And now, there are practically none left.

The Last Jews of Baghdad, supplemented by interviews with former Iraqi Jews in Canada, Israel and the United States, chills the blood.

Ramin Farahani's Jews of Iran is disturbing as well. Filmed with the permission of the Islamic authorities "under the usual restrictions," it was shot in Teheran, Isfahan and Shiraz.

The first scene unfolds in a Jewish school, where a teacher instructs pupils to light sabbath candles and chant prayers. Farahani interviews a Jewish teenager. She complains that "religious minorities" are denied entry to some universities in Teheran.

In her wake, a Jewish girl tells a horror story. She left a fine private school because an Islamic studies teacher maligned her by claiming she was "impure" and "untouchable."

Morris Motahed, the sole Jew in parliament, says that "religious minorities" have not had access to civil service jobs since the 1979 Islamic revolution. And Jews in Teheran are apparently not permitted to use Muslim bathhouses either.

Farahani's camera pans on an old Jewish woman in a hospital bed. She is in a state of despair, bewailing her loneliness. She is alone in the world, her children having immigrated to Israel.

The implicit anti-Semitism that permeates some circles in Iran is revealed as a Muslim student talks about her esteemed Jewish teacher, a Mr. Sasson. With a beatific smile, she expresses affection and respect for him, but admits she does not care for Jews because of Israel's existence.

Iranian Jews are under stress to conform to national norms, and in line with this pressure, a Jewish doctor exhorts Jews at a meeting to be Iranians first.

All is not black, however, in Jews of Iran. We're offered a glimpse of what seems like a genuine friendship between a Jewish and a Muslim woman. And in a jewelry shop whose proprietor is a Jew, a Muslim customer speaks well of Iranian Jews. If only Israel did not make trouble, she adds.

As befits a film about Iran's Jewish dimension, there is a reference to the 13 Jews arrested in 1998 on charges of being Israeli spies.

Jews have lived in Iran for more than 2,000 years, but since 1979, their presence has diminished as Iran's overall population has doubled. Twenty thousand Jews remain, compared to 100,000 a generation ago, and what the future holds in store for them is a great mystery.

Advice books help survive life's challenges

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

Going through something for the first time can be difficult and even scary.

But experiences such as entering university, getting married, getting divorced or having a baby can also teach us valuable life lessons.

That's the idea behind the "How to survive..." series of self-help guides created by venture capitalist Yadin Kaufman and Mark Bernstein, a former senior vice-president of CNN.

A year-and-a-half ago, Kaufman, a native New Yorker who now lives in Israel, and Bernstein, who lives in California, formed a company called Hundreds of Heads. It employs 10 "head hunters" in Israel, the United States and Canada who interview people about how they've dealt with major life transitions.

The idea behind the name and the business is that it's better to get advice from lots of people – "hundreds of heads" – than from just one.

"One expert can't give a whole lot of people with completely different personalities and needs individual advice," said Toronto's Andrea Syrtash, the series' Canadian "head hunter."

Because the people interviewed bring different life experiences to bear on each topic, she said, the books contain a lot of contradictory advice.

But canvassing many opinions has helped the books appeal to a wider audience, she added.

So far, six titles have been written in the "How to survive…" series, which Syrtash describes as "Dummies guides meets Chicken Soup for the Soul meets Zagats," and 100,000 copies have been sold in total.

How to Survive Your Freshman Fear was first – Kaufman came up with the idea for the series when his son was applying for university – and it's already in its fourth printing. It's now the number 1 selling college guide of its kind.

"College students would rather hear from other college students about ways to get through their first year," Syrtash said.

Other titles include How to Survive Baby's First Year, How to Survive Your Teenager and How to Survive Your Marriage.

Topics on the horizon include pregnancy, weddings, diets and in-laws.

Though it's not specifically Jewish, Syrtash said the series has a Jewish flavour. Many of the people interviewed are Jews, and Syrtash said the books fit the Jewish community ethos of helping to guide fellow Jews through challenges.

Canadian readers who are interested in contributing to future titles can contact Syrtash at andrea_Syrtash@yahoo.com.

Fantasy becoming reality for Jesse Levine, tennis phenom

By IAN SADINSKY
Special to The CJN

BOCA RATON, Fla. — Jesse Levine is seeing his fantasy of being a tennis professional quickly becoming a reality.

After being enrolled in some of the best tennis schools in South Florida, Levine quickly made his mark on the U.S. tennis landscape, compiling a 37-0 record in 2002, and finishing as the number 1 ranked player in the country in the 14 and under category.

The spotless record in 2002 does not tell the whole story of this young phenom's character. In the final U.S. Championship match in Fort Lauderdale, Levine was down 5-0 in the deciding third set facing double match point at 15-40. He then reeled off an amazing 27 consecutive points, winning the set 7-5 and the championship.

Levine is currently ranked 23rd in the world by the International Tennis Federation (ITF) in the under-18 category and 16th in the United States by the United States Tennis Association (USTA).

He continues to make strides in the competitive world of elite tennis, but the 17-year-old recently had to withdraw from his first ATP (professional) tournament in Tampa against a player formally ranked 200th in the world. In the third set, Levine pulled out because of recurring abdominal pains.

In April, however, he advanced to the semi-finals in the Easter Bowl in Palm Springs, Calif., and earlier that month he was again a semi-finalist at the International Spring Champs tournament in Carson, Calif. Levine and his partner, Michael Shabaz, advanced to the finals in doubles action at the Carson event.

In January at the Australian Open, Levine had three match points over the number 1 seed, Sun Yong Kim of Korea. Unfortunately, Kim fought back to win, but Levine had given notice that he would be a force to be reckoned with internationally.

In the Australian Open doubles, Levine and Shabaz took Kim and his partner to the limit before eventually succumbing to the top-ranked duo.

Having grown up in Ottawa, Levine holds dual U.S-Canadian citizenship. His family moved to Florida four years ago because of his younger brother Daniel's health requirements.

The five-foot-eight, 145-pound lefty knows what he has to do to move up to the next level: "I have to get a lot stronger to compete with the big players. But I am working on both my strength and my speed every day."

Levine plays out of the fabled Bolletierri Tennis Academy in Bradenton, Fla., where he gets both excellent coaching and a chance to "hit some" with some of the big-time pros like Tommy Haas.

Levine's tennis role model is Sebastian Grosjean of France. "We play a very similar game and he is a very class act who doesn't let himself get caught up or distracted by the crowd," Levine said.

Another favourite is Switzerland's Roger Federer. "He is a mental rock," said Levine. "Tennis is 85 per cent mental."

Aside from his obvious maturity and skill, Levine brings blazing quickness to the courts. "I just did a 20-yard dash in 2.93 seconds," said a beaming Levine. That type of speed may counter his lack of size and vault him into the professional ranks.

His arsenal includes a big forehand, a deadly two-hand backhand, and clever, calculated volleys that eventually wear down opponents.

Levine's first coach was his dad, Nate, who played varsity tennis at Penn State before moving to Canada where he married Shelli Kimmel of Ottawa. Levine recalls paying tennis when he was about seven or eight "with my parents and little brother in our driveway."

Detecting his son's obvious ability, Nate took him to the Ottawa Athletic Club where he began his climb up the tennis ladder. In his first tournament for players 12 and under, Levine reached the finals, although he was only 10.

He also enjoys playing basketball and soccer. "Basketball is my favourite sport, but I knew because of my size I was going to always have additional challenges. So, I chose tennis."

Levine, who is in Grade 12 and studies every day through the University of Miami's On-Line High School program, is also "a tremendous big brother," Nate says. "When he comes home for a weekend, instead of hanging with his friends, Jesse will take his little brother to the movies. Daniel is his biggest fan and followed Jesse's performance at the Australian Open on the Internet. He gave us point by point updates on how Jesse was doing."

Levine will soon have to choose between staying as an amateur or going professional. He is already playing in qualifiers for regional ATP tournaments but he will likely hold off accepting any prize money for the moment.

"I'm living my dream playing tennis," Jesse said. "Thanks to tennis, I've been to Australia, Brazil, Mexico, Costa Rica, Aruba and the Dominican Republic.

"My advice to other young players," he continued, "is never give up on your dreams, because anything can happen."

Wheelchair athlete makes national junior basketball team

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

As a young boy, Shayne Smith used to love watching hockey and basketball. Playing the games was another matter. He never thought he would be able to participate in those sports because, among other things, he has only half a hand.

Smith's life forever changed the day he entered Variety Village, a Scarborough sports training and fitness centre, nearly nine years ago. That's where he learned he could do whatever he set his heart on. This summer, the 16-year-old wheelchair basketball player will represent Canada at the World Junior Championships in Birmingham, England.

A multiple amputee who lost both legs, part of one arm and part of his other hand to a rare childhood disease called meningococcal septicemia, Smith was only given a two per cent chance of survival. He defied the odds and is now thriving in a sport few figured he could ever play.

"[The key to my success] is keeping an open mind," he said prior to leaving for a five-day training camp in Edmonton with the national team. "When I first started playing basketball, people told my coach he was setting me up for failure.

"I'm determined and that's what it's about. Being able to prove everyone wrong is what kept me going."

While Smith won't score 40 or 50 points a game for the Variety Village Rolling Rebels, his main role on the court is to set screens to help get the better shooters into the key for open shots.

He says his next goal is to compete in the Paralympic Games. While he doesn't know when that will be, Smith guarantees that one day, he will make the team.

He's been invited to an elite basketball camp at the University of Illinois in July in which the world's top 20 players will participate. Smith, the youngest player on Team Canada, will then fly back to Toronto to continue preparing for the World Juniors that begin on Aug. 4. He hopes to return to the Chicago school in a few years on a scholarship.

Smith practises twice a week, but goes through a daily training regimen after returning home from his Grade 11 classes at Don Mills Collegiate.

"I push the length of the apartment building hallway back and forth 50 times, come inside, have some water, and then do 100 push-ups and 100 sit-ups," he says of his 1½- to two-hour routine.

Away from the basketball court, Smith is also involved with Variety Village. Last year, he co-hosted its Sunshine Games with wrestling superstar Trish Stratus.

He has also done some public speaking on their behalf, but says the opportunities have been limited as of late.

Smith hopes to get into public speaking when he's older, and recently became a Ready, Willing & Able (RWA) ambassador for Paralympics Ontario. That involves visiting schools and rehab centres to teach kids – with and without disabilities – about wheelchair basketball.

He no longer golfs, but continues to play sledge hockey for the Mississauga Cruisers as their first-line right-winger. A special attachment fits on to his right hand when he plays.

Smith remains grateful for everything Variety Village has done for him over the years.

"If it wasn't for Variety Village, I wouldn't even be playing basketball, let alone playing basketball for Team Canada," he said. "Variety Village has absolutely changed my life and given me so much opportunity."

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

Providing employment for the needy – and most people would be needy if not for their jobs – is considered to be the highest form of "charity," as it enables a person to have a sense of dignity and self-worth. It should thus be no surprise that firing workers may only be done within carefully prescribed boundaries.

Rabbi Moshe Feinstein takes it as given that no worker can be dismissed without cause and explanation. Even after the expiry of a contract, an employer must rehire the original worker, provided work is still available. Only a clear declaration that a person is being hired for a specific job and time period would allow for dismissal at will.

Thus, most employees who in today's business environment are hired without contract and for an indefinite time period may not be fired without due cause. And the only truly justifiable cause for a firing – as opposed to layoffs due to economic necessity – is incompetence. A competent worker may not be fired even in order to hire someone who is more talented – the latter would have to be an additional hire. An employee should not have to worry that their job is always in danger.

In reality, explains Rabbi Feinstein, an employer can't fire someone as punishment for past incompetence, but because past incompetence usually indicates a future with more of the same. However, if the employee can offer a good explanation as to why things will be different going forward, they should be given the benefit of the doubt. Of course, the key – and not too simple – issue is how to define incompetence. At a bare minimum, it means that employees must be told and warned about any potential deficiencies, so that the necessary adjustments can be made.

Nonetheless, workers in the public sector are held to an exacting standard, due to the potential harm that can arise from their mistakes. Thus, the Talmud rules that ritual slaughterers, teachers, doctors and scribes are to be fired immediately, and without warning, for their incompetence, which would include teaching improper material or missing an obvious diagnosis. The seriousness of their failures – which can cause irreparable harm to others' physical or spiritual well-being – are warning enough. Nevertheless, even in these cases, a pattern of incompetence must be established.

However, behaviour that an employer considers repugnant is not grounds for dismissal – only religious leaders are evaluated based on their personal life.

A holy, but impossible, job

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Rabbis are fascinating characters.

Imagine holding a position where 50 or 1,000 families expect you to be constantly accessible for a simchah, or on call should sorrow occur. Consider that this expectation means a rabbi who may have finally found some holiday time is frequently called back if a shul member passes away.

My father was a rabbi, and I recall this scenario occurring on a regular basis while he and my mother were vacationing. I also remember feeling so badly for them, and especially for my mother, as my dad had an inherent acceptance of this aspect of the job.

Rabbis are generally strong. They are, because their job description requires that they always have empathy for their congregants and that they consistently behave in a righteous manner – acting almost like a surrogate holy man for the rest of us.

Rabbis are like zebras – to some their stripes are black, to others white. I have heard lofty testimonies from members of one synagogue about how their rabbi has spent nights sitting and praying by their bedside, or that of a family member, while they ailed in the hospital. Then there are others in the same congregation who complain angrily about the rabbi's emotional distance and the need for the shul to "replace him with someone who understands the human condition."

I am frequently boggled by the enormous energy rabbis must exert to ensure they are liked, or at least respected, by their congregants, and I marvel at how tenuous this relationship can be.

A few years ago, a well-respected rabbi told a long-standing member family in his congregation that he would be unable to officiate at the funeral of their father, who had passed away the day before. The rabbi's reasons were legitimate. He was booked up with a bar mitzvah and another funeral, after which he would have to leave town to tend to a family crisis. The rabbi added that he would find a worthy replacement.

The family was disgusted, aghast and appalled. They quit the shul, levied public criticism against the rabbi, and went on diatribes about his unsympathetic disposition for years afterward. I am tempering my words, but suffice it to say that their disparagement and condemnation of a person whom they had previously considered to be almost angelic is generally reserved for folks who defraud the elderly or abscond with the savings of a pauper.

In my library is a tongue-in-cheek article that my father left me about the impossible balance a rabbi must achieve in his life. Paraphrasing, I recall its content here: A rabbi is expected to be the consummate talmudic scholar, yet have the ability to shmooze about the weakest link in the Raptors' lineup or a problem with the pilot light on the shul's stove. He or she must embrace every individual who pays dues as if they are family, but must also be a role model as a parent, raising the synagogue's children and his or her own with great mastery. A rabbi must be painfully truthful, yet a seasoned peacemaker. He or she must influence his or her followers about the poetry found within Torah, but never preach about the importance of learning it.

Rabbis. We all have opinions about them, often ones that are not so glorious, but as the sun sets and our life is in turmoil, the first number we call is that of our rabbi.

It takes an exceptional human being to pursue a rabbinical ordination and retain a pulpit for an extended period of time. Being a rabbi is not a job for me, but kudos to those who choose it as a profession and perform their obligations with a reasonable amount of finesse and grace.

CLC motion seeks to end settlements, fence

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A resolution demanding that Canada pressure Israel to dismantle its security barrier and end its "illegal" settlement of the West Bank, Gaza and east Jerusalem was presented at the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC) triennial convention last week, but did not make it to the floor for a vote.

Proposal referred to executive council

Like other resolutions that the approximately 2,000 delegates did not have time to deal with, the resolution was referred to the CLC's executive council, which is scheduled to meet in the fall. If adopted, the resolution will become CLC policy.

The resolution cites the July 2, 2004, International Court of Justice decision that the barrier, which the CLC refers to as "a separation wall," is contrary to international law. It also says the occupation and settlements violate United Nations resolutions 224 and 338. It notes that the UN General Assembly on July 21, 2004, voted 150-6, with 10 abstentions including Canada's, to endorse the International Court ruling.

The resolution also states that the CLC will "develop and distribute educational resource materials on the situation in Palestine/Israel from unions and solidarity organizations."

The resolution is a composite of six resolutions submitted by CLC affiliates concerning the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. They came from the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) and its locals, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, the British Columbia Federation of Labour, and district labour councils in Calgary, Kamloops and Vancouver.

Israelis germinate 2,000-year-old seeds

JERUSALEM — Israeli researchers have germinated a sapling date palm from 2,000-year-old seeds in a bid to find new medicines that will benefit future generations.

Sarah Sallon, of the Louis Borick Natural Medicine Research Center in Jerusalem, in collaboration with botanist Elaine Solowey of the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies at Kibbutz Ketura, used seeds found in archeological excavations at the ancient mountain fortress of Masada, where ancient Jewish rebels chose suicide over capture by Roman legions in 73 CE.

Sallon said they were the oldest seeds ever brought back to life.

"A lotus seed was germinated [in China] after 1,200 years, but nothing has been germinated coming from this far back, not to 2,000 years," she said.

Carbon dating of a fragment from the Masada seeds put their age at between 1,940 and 2,040 years.

The palm plant, which is now about 30 centimetres tall, is nicknamed Methusaleh after the biblical figure said to have lived for 969 years.

Young People of the Books

The annual Hebrew Book Week opened last week in Israel. Throughout the country, Hebrew-language books were put on display and offered for sale to buyers young and old, such as the young girl examining these new books in Tel Aviv's Yarkon Park. Last year, more than Hebrew-language 5,000 books were published in Israel. [Israel photo]

Call to Protest Award

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada urged 43 new Order of Canada recipients to protest the refusal to revoke the award from Saskatchewan native leader David Ahenakew, who is on trial for an anti-Semitic tirade. To protest the fact Ahenakew still holds the award, the group called on new Order members to put a strip of black tape over their pins at the June 10 induction ceremony. Ahenakew is awaiting the verdict, expected June 30, of a hate-crimes trial for an anti-Semitic tirade in 2002. Nearly a dozen prominent award holders published letters in the National Post against Ahenakew, but none of the new recipients reportedly heeded B'nai Brith's call.

NEW YORK — The American Jewish Committee last week gave its Imaging Division Human Relations Award to Joel Seigel, founder and head of Markham, Ont.-based electronics importer Gentec International, for his "professional achievements and devotion to philanthropy and communal responsibility," the rights group said. Among his philanthropic pursuits, Seigel is active in the Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada and fundraising for Mount Sinai Hospital.

Chief Rabbi Knighted

LONDON — Britain's chief rabbi was knighted earlier this month. Queen Elizabeth, marking her 79th birthday, bestowed the vaunted "Sir" title on Rabbi Jonathan Sacks for service to the Jewish community and interfaith relations. "This is an honour not just for me but for the Jewish community and its contributions to British life, as well as for the continuing inspiration of Jewish teachings," said Rabbi Sacks, chief rabbi since 1991. Also knighted was Iqbal Sacranie, head of the Muslim Council of Britain.

Beatification Delayed

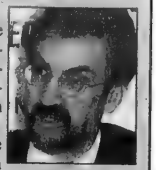
ROME — The beatification of a French priest has been postponed due to concerns over his anti-Semitic writings. Leon Dehon's beatification was approved by the late Pope John Paul II, but in a rare move, his successor Benedict XVI is having the file re-examined. Dehon, who died in 1925, founded the order of priests of Sacre Cœur. Among his anti-Semitic statements: Jews should wear a special garment identifying them as Jews and be consigned to ghettos. Dehon also said "anti-Semitism is a sign of hope." Benedict's move might be unique in Catholic history, since once a candidate's "miracles" are recognized, only a papal death can stop the beatification process.

Cemeteries Desecrated

LONDON — Two U.K Jewish cemeteries were desecrated within 72 hours of each other. In the latest incident last week, some 100 gravestones were pushed over and damaged in London's West Ham Jewish Cemetery. Two inverted swastikas were drawn on four stones, the door of the Rothschild family's mausoleum was smashed and anti-Semitic, pro-Nazi slogans were daubed at its entrance. The attack follows damage to some 80 stones in a Manchester cemetery. Meanwhile, more than 100 graves were vandalized in Budapest's main Jewish cemetery, but it's unclear when, as the cemetery was closed to visitors June 12 to 15 for Shavuot.

Muslim Group Apologizes for Hitler Slur

TORONTO — The Canadian Islamic Congress apologized last week for an article it distributed that said controversial U.S. commentator Daniel Pipes and others "follow Hitler's propaganda techniques flawlessly" with their "anti-Islam and anti-Muslim propaganda."



Daniel Pipes

In the April 29 edition of its online Friday Bulletin, the congress re-published a 2003 article by its vice-president Wahida Valiante titled "Worth Repeating: Media Propaganda: Hitler, Bush and the 'Big Lie.'"

In it, Valiante said, "It would not be going too far to compare the North American media's fear-mongering disinformation tactics about Islam and Muslim 'terrorism' and Bush's 'Us' versus 'Them' stance to those practised so successfully, and with such terrible results, by Hitler on the citizens of Germany's Weimer [sic] republic." The article also criticized scholars Bernard Lewis and Samuel Huntington. The congress has since removed it from its website.

"The Canadian Islamic Congress and Ms Valiante apologize without reservation and retract remarks in the column that suggest that Dr. Daniel Pipes is a follower of Hitler or that he uses the tactics of Hitler or that he wants to ethnically cleanse America of its Muslim presence," the group said.

Pipes, an academic and columnist, heads the Middle East Forum think-tank, as well as Campus Watch, which says it monitors "the often erroneous and biased teachings and writings of U.S. professors specializing in the Middle East."

Citizenship of war crimes suspects may be revoked

Minister to ask cabinet to move on the issue

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Citizenship and Immigration Minister Joe Volpe announced last week he would ask the federal cabinet to revoke the citizenship of five Nazi war crime suspects.

Volpe will ask cabinet to strip the citizenship of Helmut Oberlander, Vladimir Katriuk, Jacob Fast, Michael Baumgartner and Wasyl Odynsky. Some of their cases have been languishing in the legal system for up to six years, ever since Federal Court judges found they had obtained Canadian citizenship by lying about their participation in the Nazi killing machinery.

Volpe's announcement came a few days after a parliamentary committee recommended major changes to Canada's citizenship laws – steps critics contend would make bringing Nazi war criminals to justice even more difficult than it already is.

The committee, chaired by Kitchener-Waterloo MP Andrew Telegdi, recommended that the standard of proof needed to strip a suspect of citizenship should be raised from a civil proceeding's "balance of probabilities" to a criminal court's "beyond a reasonable doubt."

The committee also urged that the entire citizenship revocation process be shifted to the courts and that trial judges be given several penalty options, including revocation, jail or a fine.

Currently, the Federal Court determines whether a suspect obtained citizenship by fraud, but it's up to the federal cabinet to actually revoke citizenship.

Volpe reportedly will seek to revoke the citizenship of all five Nazi collaborators "within weeks."

The government's new-found vigour was applauded by Jewish organizations.

"I'm glad these cases in the pipeline are proceeding," said Ed Morgan, president of Canadian Jewish Congress. "These cases have been on [the minister's] plate for some time," and even before that, on his predecessors'.

"It's high time" these cases were addressed, said David Matas, a spokesperson for B'nai Brith Canada.

Matas said the cases have been tied up thanks to "a one-person crusade to stop this process" led by Telegdi.

Telegdi, who immigrated to Canada from Hungary as a child, "has bamboozled people and paralyzed the system," Matas said.

The MP has said Oberlander has done nothing wrong, but the court record shows Oberlander was an interpreter in a mobile Nazi killing unit.

"They went into a place and said, 'Where are the Jews,' and they'd round up the Jews and kill them," Matas said.

German Einsatzgruppen units relied on local populations for information to find Jews. That's where interpreters came in.

Telegdi "should approach [the issue] from the perspective of bringing Nazi war criminals to justice. His approach is from the wrong end of the telescope," Matas added.

Telegdi, meanwhile, told The CJN that the committee operated on the assumption that any changes to immigration legislation must comply with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

"Essentially, what we're saying is that the same rights should apply to a citizen [in a citizenship case] as to a shoplifter… We feel the loss of citizenship was equal or much greater in terms of consequences than shoplifting."

The committee also felt the process should be taken out of the hands of cabinet, which is subject to political considerations, and handed to the courts, he added.

Telegdi said that under the current system, no court has pronounced any suspects to be war criminals, merely that on the balance of probabilities, they misrepresented facts when they came to Canada.

Greater Toronto Area

They are changing the world

It would be singularly difficult to overstate the importance of the event that unfolded last week at the Empire Club of Canada luncheon in Toronto.

Tony Comper, the president and chief executive officer of BMO Financial Group, was given the dais at the Empire Club to speak to a broad Canadian audience about FAST, a coalition of corporate citizens and business leaders he and his wife, Elizabeth, recently founded to join in, if not spearhead, the fight against anti-Semitism.

From the editor's desk

An acronym for Fighting AntiSemitism Together, FAST has attracted to its membership some of the top echelon of Canada's corporate community, people such as Courtney Pratt, president and chief executive officer of Stelco Inc., Michael J. Sabia, president and chief executive officer of Bell Canada Enterprises and Dominic D'Allesandro, president and chief executive officer of Manulife Financial. They are all representative of the high-level achievement of the members of the coalition.

They are also all representative of the fact that the founding members, at least, of FAST are not Jewish.

And that was purposefully one of the key aspects of the organization's design and one of the key messages delivered by Comper last week.

"I am here," Comper told the hundreds assembled at the Empire Club, "because my wife, Elizabeth, and I believe that in the end, this is a crisis [the rise of anti-Semitism] that must be resolved by non-Jews.

"That is why we founded FAST… as one way of crying, 'Enough!' And why we recruited an all-star cast of non-Jewish Canadian business leaders… to the cause."

The resolve that stirred their hearts has now been transformed into an utterly unique, first-of-its-kind plan of action that now inspires and stirs the hearts of others. That is why it would be hard to exaggerate the significance of the luncheon address last week at the Empire Club.

That the initiative is from private citizens, that the citizens embody the highest levels of the Canadian "establishment" and that they publicly proclaimed the program in a forum that symbolizes the historic white Anglo-Saxon Protestant majority elite of Canadian society, is without precedent.

The promoters of all forms of hatred – not simply the anti-Semitic variety – will now have to take notice that there will be no shelter for their prejudices and hatred within Canadian society. The alleyways, coffee houses, schoolyards and the boardrooms will now be closed to them. Their only recourse will be to slither at night like the roaches beneath the rocks, cowering from the light of day.

"We realize that this initiative – and for that matter, any others that FAST may undertake – is unlikely to touch the hearts and minds of the real hard-core crowd, the ones who most likely learned their hatred at the parental knee," Comper said.

"But it could serve to further marginalize them, which sometimes is the best you can do when dealing with bullies and bigots… First, by stripping them of their potential power base, the people who really don't know any better; and who, for whatever reasons, haven't sought out the truth for themselves.

"Second, by going one step further and helping to encourage active opposition to the Jew-haters and racists and assorted other bigots and bullies the moment they start telling their despicable lies or making their ugly, pathetic 'jokes.' We believe if the truth can make us free, it should also make us bold."

As was widely reported last month in this and other newspapers, when FAST was launched, the group's first educational project, which it hopes to begin in the fall, is a curriculum-based learning program called Choose Your Voice that it is developing in close partnership with the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, for use initially in Ontario schools.

Comper spoke movingly of his and his wife's resolve in their campaign against anti-Semitism.

He concluded his remarks by invoking the famous articulation by the late scholar, philosopher Emil Fackenheim, of a 614th commandment that Jews are forbidden to give Hitler posthumous victories.

"I am here today," Comper told the hushed and utterly attentive audience, "because I believe that this should not be a lonely battle – as it has so often been, for so many, for so long. And because I believe that this 614th commandment is something we all should be living by."

Last week in The CJN, we wrote about the new phenomenon of social, as opposed to corporate, entrepreneurs who respond to the call of conscience by marshalling their managerial skills and corporate talents to try to make a positive difference in the world.

Corporate entrepreneurs at the elite level, Tony and Elizabeth Comper, are social entrepreneurs, too, now also changing our world for the better. — MBD

DR. BARAK: Aharon Barak, centre, the president of Israel's Supreme Court, was awarded an honorary doctor of laws degree at last week's convocation of the University of Toronto's law school. Joining him were university chancellor Vivienne Poy, right, and former law school dean Ron Daniels. A child survivor of the Kovno Ghetto, Barak told graduates that the Holocaust imbued in him not hatred or hopelessness, but a belief in "the centrality of the human being" and a zeal to uphold human rights. He praised Canada's Charter of Rights as a model, and called Canada's Supreme Court "one of the best in the world." Human rights are needed most, he said, in times of war and in the fight against terrorism. [Ron Csillag photo]

Urban retreat planned for Jewish women

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

Empowering Jewish women is the goal of Sara's Tent, an urban retreat taking place in Thornhill and Forest Hill this summer.

According to the program's mission, the retreat, running from July 4 to 15, exists "in order to bring all Jewish women together to strengthen their connection to mind, body and soul through a series of fun and stimulating classes in the areas of Jewish learning, creativity and art making, health and wellness, and exercise."

> Designed to strengthen connection to mind, body and soul

Program co-organizer Kinneret Feuer said that "Jewish women very seldom have the time to not only nurture themselves but also to come together with other Jewish women to laugh, to play, to learn and to unwind".

Feuer is a certified yoga instructor and creative arts therapist who has, for many years, been running classes within the Toronto Jewish community. Her co-organizer, Susan Zehavi, is trained in traditional Chinese medicine, lymph drainage, cranial sacral therapy and nutrition. Zehavi has a private health and wellness practice in Toronto.

These two active Jewish women are working in conjunction with the Jewish Family Institute, which promotes positive relationships between parents, children and spouses, and offers the retreat at which women can "exist cohesively in order to discover the beauty and power of being a Jew and being a woman."

In the past, Feuer and Zehavi have offered three-day summer retreats to Collingwood, but this year the two-week city retreat is being introduced, allowing women who cannot leave home for three days the opportunity to take part.

From 9:30 to 10:30 a.m. every morning, the program will centre around "personal growth and development – workshops from a Jewish perspective," while 10:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. will see the women participating in arts, exercise and health and wellness classes.

Feuer says the name of the program is important in understanding its aim. Sara refers to Abraham's wife, and the tent is a place of warmth and a protective environment. Holding the program in different parts of the city gives Jewish women the chance to create a protective environment no matter where they are.

"Within Jewish observance, there is endless opportunity to bring together our identities of being traditional Jewish women with the beauty of all the things the world has to offer us," said Feuer.

Much of the program will focus on integrating Jewish tradition with self-nurturing.

In light of the Jewish tradition that the Messiah will be ushered in by women, Feuer felt it was important for all women to take part in the program. "Women have gathered together throughout time and every time. They create a very powerful energy," she said.

For more information, call Kinneret Feuer at 416-784-3355 or Susan Zehavi at 416-787-4934.

Federation eyes future with Vaughan development

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's planned Vaughan campus is a prime example of community members working together to take responsibility for their children's future, the organization's annual general meeting heard earlier this month.

As the federation's leadership changed hands at the end of board chair Leslie Gales' two-year tenure, federation president Ted Sokolsky said that over the past two years, board members took "reasonable risks and planned carefully, but were never scared to act boldly."

Looking forward, Sokolsky said, the community must plan for the sake of its children, as federation is doing through its Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) project, which includes the development of the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus at Bathurst Street and Weldrick Avenue in Richmond Hill.

Delegates were shown a short video illustrating the planned 50-acre, $125-million campus, which broke ground in May and is scheduled to open in stages from 2006 through 2009.

It will house a range of family and social services, as well as cultural agencies and fitness, child care and conference facilities. It will also include up to four Jewish day schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's northern branch.

The campus, which is meant to serve York Region's 60,000 Jews, is part of a $250-million fundraising campaign that will finance the renovation of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre at Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue and the rebuilding of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre just north of Sheppard Avenue.

UJA Federation is governed by community members and every Jew in the Toronto area who supports its aims and objectives is entitled to be an individual member. At the meeting, members elected 120 individual representatives to two-year terms on the federation's council, along with representatives from community groups and organizations, who sit the council for one year.

Delivering a dvar Torah, Rabbi David Seed, assistant rabbi of Adath Israel Congregation, said that just as Jews count Sfirat Haomer one day at a time, the community is strong because of individuals who come together one by one to be included in events and projects.

Using federation's recent Walk with Israel as an example, Rabbi Seed said he was impressed by the number of people who came together in a show of community solidarity.

In her farewell address, Gales said it was an honour to serve "one of the world's most impressive Jewish organizations."

Most inspiring, she said, was the passion, commitment and time that volunteers put into it.

Immediate past board chair Ralph Shedletsky announced the appointment of David Engel and David Koschitzky, as the federation's new chair and vice-chair of the board, respectively, and he offered his personal thanks to Gales for her service.

In his address, Engel said he is a product of Jewish values and a traditional upbringing, noting that he was educated at a Jewish day school, went on trips to Israel, was a member of B'nai Brith Youth Organization and was part of a community that encourages volunteerism.

He said his goals for the next two years involve making Jewish education as accessible as possible to all community members, as well as raising levels of community engagement, continuing the JTT project, developing a plan to care for the growing number of elderly Jews in the city and strengthening ties with Israel.

'It's all about demography,' ex-Israeli envoy warns

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A ticking demographic time bomb threatens Israel's future as a democratic Jewish state, former Israeli diplomat Alon Pinkas warns.

"It's all about demography," Pinkas told UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's annual general meeting at Adath Israel Synagogue recently.

Israel will not be able to function as a Jewish democracy if it continues controlling the lives of 3.5 million Palestinian Arabs in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, said Pinkas, a third generation Israeli who was consul general in New York City until last year.

Anyone who thinks otherwise is "delusional," he declared.

Alon Pinkas

Calling Israel's forthcoming withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the West Bank as a "step in the right direction," Pinkas said, "We need to disengage and get out of Gaza."

Although he did not explicitly call for a similar pullout from all of the West Bank, this appeared to be his implicit message.

About Israel's current prime minister, Ariel Sharon, Pinkas observed: "Sharon understands what it means to be in Gaza. No one understands reality better than Sharon."

Israel's disengagement from the Palestinians is not a question of partisan politics but of practical necessity, Pinkas suggested in a brief, hard-hitting speech.

Pinkas said the separation fence Israel is currently building through the West Bank and along the Green Line dovetails with its disengagement strategy.

Providing hard numbers about Mideast demographics, he said there are currently 5.2 million Jews, 4.8 million Palestinians and 1.3 million Israeli Arabs living between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea.

By 2011 or 2012, Arabs there will outnumber Jews by even a greater margin, imperilling the basic moral imperative of Zionism, Pinkas observed.

When that demographic point is reached, he predicted, Palestinians will reject a two-state solution as impractical and impossible, and demand "one state for two peoples," the antithesis of the Zionist dream.

Under ideal circumstances, Israel could circumvent the growing demographic problem with mass aliyah from North America or much higher Jewish birthrates.

But given the unlikelihood of these scenarios, Israel must do "the right thing" and disengage from the Palestinians, Pinkas said.

He had sharp words for right-wing and left-wing Israelis.

He attacked the right for believing Palestinians in the territories can be controlled without dire consequences to Israel's viability as a democratic Jewish state.

He chastised the left for thinking the Palestinians will negotiate with Israel in good faith. They will not become Swedes or Canadians, he said in a reference to their capacity for coexistence.

Pinkas also had "good news" for his audience.

Despite its problems, deficiencies and inadequacies, Israel has fared well in its 57 years of existence, he said.

Strategically, in fact, Israel has never had it better, he added.

Militarily, Israel is stronger than any foreseeable Arab coalition, though Iran could pose an existential threat should it acquire nuclear weapons.

Economically, Israel enjoys a huge advantage over the oil-rich Arab world. Israel's per capita gross domestic product is $17,000 (US), while the Arab nations are stuck at $3,200.

Politically, Israel's democracy is a unique phenomenon in the region, notwithstanding the fact its founders came from undemocratic countries.

And technologically, Israel is an international leader.

But in a stinging critique of Israeli capitalism, Pinkas said the gap between the wealthiest 10 per cent of Israelis and the poorest 10 per cent was the widest in the industrialized West, and should be remedied.

Envoy visits and so does death, again

The pattern by now has been quite well-established and we have commented on it in this space often in the past. With every visit to Israel and the Palestinian territories by a U.S. envoy to help facilitate the delicate process of accommodation between Israelis and Palestinians, Palestinian terrorists – the gunmen and thugs of the army of hate – draw blood.

Their aims are as transparent as they are many: to kill Jews (this still remains their foremost aim), to visibly defy American policy, to humiliate the Palestinian Authority, to enrage the Israeli public and to confound the process of accommodation.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice last weekend visited Israel and the Palestinian Authority. She was in the region to push the Israelis and the Palestinians to co-operate on the upcoming withdrawal from Gaza and the northern West Bank. She met with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Sunday and PA President Mahmoud Abbas on Saturday. "Both parties will have to do their part if this is indeed to be a peaceful and orderly withdrawal," Rice said during a joint press conference with Abbas in Ramallah. She undoubtedly also imparted her views to both leaders concerning the agenda and manner of meeting between Sharon and Abbas that was scheduled for Tuesday, June 21.

While Rice was still making her rounds through the various offices of the Israeli government, Palestinian terrorists belonging to Islamic Jihad and to the Abu Rish Brigades of Fatah attacked an IDF unit in Gaza killing one soldier and wounding two.

As reported in The Jerusalem Post, "the Sunday attack came after multiple attempts over the weekend by Palestinian terrorist organizations to mount a successful attack in advance of Condoleezza Rice's visit to the region. All were thwarted by the IDF."

Also on Sunday, a 15-year-old Palestinian boy was arrested at the Hawara checkpoint in the West Bank with five pipe bombs. It was the 21st incident in the past three months and the 30th attempt this year in which children have been prevented by the IDF from attempting to smuggle ammunition and weapons for terrorist attacks on civilians.

Palestinian terrorist groups are still fully functional despite Abbas' promise to halt the violence against Israel. And worse: the terrorists' recruitment of young teenagers to perpetrate violence against Israel continues unabated.

The United States and Israel are trying to prop up Abbas to ensure as smooth a disengagement as possible. But like the weak-kneed addict who flounders amid his own irresolution and harping self-delusion, he refuses to take the ultimately necessary steps for true liberation.

Abbas is effectively a captive of the terror groups. Despite his occasional remonstrations, they know he will take no steps against them. They operate with effective impunity. And he operates, therefore, without credibility. The "authority" in Palestinian Authority is more fictional than it is real. More to the shame of Mahmoud Abbas and to the ultimate detriment of his people.

Response to Wolle

Howard Wolle ("Wants to hear the settlers' side," letter, CJN, June 9) should reread Paul Michaels' May 26 column, "Some truths are hard to hear." Wolle talks about "the settlers" generally and castigates Michaels as one of many who are "attacking settlers from the comfort of their North American homes."

But Michaels' piece was precise and based on reports by and conversations with Israeli journalists from Ma'ariv, Ha'aretz and the Jerusalem Report. He was clear that "a very small number of settlers are involved in the attacks and intimidation" of Palestinians. As he said, the evidence that this group has been operating way outside legal boundaries is significant and growing.

The June 6 issue of Ha'aretz reported: "The most extreme zealots keep coming up with ever more malicious and destructive ideas – arson, plowing cultivated fields, bringing herds to seeded fields, poisoning sheep, poisoning water wells and more." Zvi Bar Hai, head of South Hebron Hills regional council is quoted: "Things have happened in the past months that are unacceptable. I have asked the police and Shin Bet to find the culprits."

Thank goodness Michaels has the courage to call a spade a spade, while Wolle would have him bury the truth irresponsibly.

NIF backs gov't. disengagement decision

Your story "New Israel Fund backs Gaza disengagement" (June 9) contains a headline that may mislead CJN readers, as well as a factual error.

The New Israel Fund backs the government of Israel's right, as the legitimate government of a democratic state, to make the disengagement decision and have it followed peacefully. What concerns NIF are threats from within Israel that call into question the government's legitimacy and encourage Israeli citizens to disrupt the implementation of this decision through violence and encouraging sedition within the Israel Defence Forces. Thus, as the article points out, we are working with, among others, settler groups who are opposed to the decision but are committed to demonstrating peacefully. Indeed, one of NIF's grantees, the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, has gone on record to defend the free speech right in Israel of anyone opposed to the disengagement.

In addition, the article mentions the sum of $300,000 (US) in discussing our total funding in Israel promoting democracy, pluralism, social and economic justice and civil rights. In fact, in 2004, NIF globally sent more than $15 million (US) to Israel for these purposes. The former figure is what is being spent this year on disengagement issues alone.

The definition of 'simple mischief'

An adult and two young offenders destroyed and defaced UJA Federation billboards, smeared graffiti on a Jewish school, overturned headstones in a Jewish cemetery and smashed synagogue windows. They were convicted of "simple mischief," instead of the more serious – and more appropriate – offence involving defacement of religious institutions ("Plea bargain accepted in vandalism case," CJN, June 9).

When they were young, my children changed the time on the clock to give themselves an extra hour or so before going to bed, they occasionally lied about doing their homework and they hid their report cards for a few days. This is "simple mischief" and they were punished. What the adult and young offenders did here is more than "simple mischief" and they ought to be punished accordingly.

USDS Richmond Hill campus moving?

I am a parent from the Richmond Hill campus of United Synagogue Day School. I was at the recent annual general meeting and while almost all of the facts in "USDS to consolidate its three campuses" (CJN, June 9) are correct, there are some things that were missed.

Upon receipt of a letter from the school's board on May 24, 2005, a group of Richmond Hill parents immediately met with board members and representatives from the school to find out what specifics had led to the decision to merge the Richmond Hill campus with the Bayview campus and house both at Beth Tikvah for the 2006-07 school year. That meeting took place on May 25. At the end of the meeting, a committee of parents was formed, with the full endorsement and co-operation of the board, to pursue other viable solutions. A meeting was then held on May 26 with all Richmond Hill parents and they were informed of the goal of our committee.

When Brian Goldberg said the board will meet with Richmond Hill parents to discuss ideas to make the transition as smooth as possible, he was not entirely correct. The board has met with us, continues to meet with us, and is working toward a solution with us that hopefully will not involve moving down to the Bayview campus. But in the event that it does require a move, they will meet with us – and we will make sure we are heard – regarding ways of making that move as easy as possible.

We have created a website, www.PreserveOurPresence.com, to keep the community involved and informed.

We celebrate as one people!

The following is excerpted from the address delivered by Rabbi Moshe Shulman on Yom Ha'atzmaut this year. We publish it at this time to emotionally and substantively "launch" readers toward the "Tribute to Israel" that appears elsewhere in this edition of the paper and because its central message is so very vital to these times.

The editor

By RABBI MOSHE SHULMAN

In the mid-1960s at the Mizrachi convention, Rabbi J. B. Soloveitchik, of blessed memory, was asked whether the flag of Israel carried any intrinsic or inherent sanctity.

He answered: "I do not hold at all with the magical attraction of a flag or of similar symbolic ceremonies. Judaism negates ritual connected with physical things. Nonetheless, we must not lose sight of a law in the Shulchan Aruch to the effect that: 'one who has been killed by non-Jews is buried in his clothes…' In other words, the clothes of the Jew acquire a certain sanctity when spattered with his blood as a martyr. How much more is this so of the blue and white flag, which has been immersed in the blood of thousands of young Jews who fell in the War of Independence defending the country and the population? It has a spark of sanctity that flows from devotion and self-sacrifice."

In these beautiful words Rabbi Soloveitchik expressed our profound understanding that the flag of Israel tells the Jewish story: it reminds us of the tragedies we have lived through, and the pain we have had to endure as a people to survive, and at the same time it speaks of the hope that we can make a difference in the world, that our struggle is not in vain, and that our sacrifices for peace – in the past, present, and future – will bring about a better tomorrow for our children.

On Yom Ha'atzmaut, 1967, weeks before the start of the Six Day War, Rav Zvi Yehuda Kook, of blessed memory, gave a profound – almost prophetic – talk in the study hall of Yeshivat Mercaz Harav in Jerusalem.

He spoke about the early years of the State, and how, on Yom Ha'atzmaut evening, every year, as the students in the yeshiva would celebrate, he used to excuse himself for a few hours – and stroll down the streets of Jaffa Road.

Why?

Because the people were celebrating in the streets. Because Jews, young and old, boys and girls, were dancing there, and he felt be'toch ami anochi yoshevet, I dwell amidst my people. (II Kings 4:13). He felt he wanted to celebrate with his people, not locked up in the ivory towers of the beth midrash. And R' Zvi Yehuda bemoaned the fact that more of his colleagues did not walk with him. What a kiddush HaShem it would have been?

But he went on to say, there was one night he did not feel like dancing in the streets with the people. That was the night after the UN vote on the partition of Palestine. All of Israel was celebrating, and he felt his heart was broken. And then Rav Zvi Yehuda began to cry:

"And where is our Hebron? And where is our Sh'chem? Or Jericho? Have we forgotten them? As the prophet Yoel proclaims: ve'et artzi chileiku (Yoel 4:2) – they have divided my land. And how can one celebrate with such a heavy heart?" he cried.

The next day, Rav Zvi Yehuda was visited by Rav Ya'akov Moshe Charlop. They spoke together, for a while, comforted each other, and then realized that whatever the challenges, whatever the setbacks, they must look at what had been accomplished. They must look at what Israel had achieved. Look at what the Almighty had blessed us with, and continues to bless us with. And so they proclaimed: zeh hayom asah HaShem, nagila ve'nismecha bo – this is the day God has made. Let us rejoice in it… (Psalms 118:24)

None of us has a monopoly on what God wants from us. None can speak on behalf of the Almighty. But I think one thing we can know for certain, and that is what God does not want from us.

He doesn't want our people divided and splintered, fighting amongst ourselves. God cares far more about ahavat Yisrael (love for every Jew) and achdut Yisrael (unity of the Jewish people) than He does about the Eretz Yisrael (the Land of Israel). And the proof is that ultimately it was sin'at chinam (hatred and strife amongst Jews) that lost us the land in the first place. (Talmud, Yuma 9b)

That's what Rav Zvi Yehuda Kook and Rav Charlop recognized so profoundly that morning after the vote on partition.

And that's what we have to recognize today.

When I hear of some spiritual leaders calling on religious Jews today to "sit out" the celebrations of Yom Ha'atzmaut this year, or not to recite Hallel this year because of the disengagement plan, my heart falls, and I cry. Have we forgotten what it's all about?

It's about klal Yisrael (the totality of the Jewish people). It's about the people of Israel. It's about standing together, shoulder to shoulder as one people: lay and rabbi, right and left, religious and secular, Orthodox or non-Orthodox, Israeli or chutznik… religious Zionist and haredi… about celebrating our differences, as much as we work together to build our future.

I will never forget the image of Rav Zvi Yehuda Kook walking down the streets of Jaffa Road on Yom Ha'atzmaut evening, celebrating with the throngs of Jews.

That's the story reflected in the Israeli flag: that blue and white tallit with a Star of David in the middle, which we wave so proudly, which sheds tears over her sons and daughters, parents and grandparents who have given their lives on the battlefronts of our nation, the battlefronts of buses and cafés of Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Netanya, Kfar Darom and so many more places. And which yet waves with such joy, inspiration, faith in God and hope over the great potential and glorious future that this gift of God called the State of Israel holds for our people.

We celebrate as one people!

We dance with our one flag of Israel!

We sing with our hearts together – filled with song and joy!

We know and we have faith that God will protect our Jewish state, that it should remain – now and forever – the eternal homeland of our people, and Jerusalem – the political, spiritual and cultural capital of our nation.

Today, we are filled with hope.

This is the day God has made. Let us sing and rejoice in it!

Opinions

I've seen it all, but...

For a rabbi, experience is an issue. In my "youth," I often heard the remark "You're a rabbi? But you're so young!" Indeed, a prominent synagogue once rejected my CV due to inexperience. A rabbi is supposed to look like Charlton Heston in The Ten Commandments.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Now, after 15 years as a rabbi, I have a new problem: too much experience.

I first encountered it at a funeral. After a meeting with the deceased's daughter, I said, with my rabbinic face of earnest concern, how sorry I was for her loss. The woman, a pulpit rabbi's secretary and familiar with the spiel, replied: "Come on Rabbi! You've seen this all before, haven't you?"

I realized then I that had too much experience.

With experience, lessons of humiliating mistakes and proud triumphs get seared into your memory. Unfortunately, experience also burns out emotional nerve endings. The instinctive feelings I had at wedding and funeral number 1 have disappeared.

It's tempting to replace lost excitement with a bored cynicism. Seasoned veterans proudly adopt a world-weary, casual attitude to life's peak moments. When you've seen it all, life is all reruns, no?

Frankly, cynicism is merely a disguise for emotional impotence. Instead, I've found a different response, based on some talmudic wisdom.

Boredom during prayer is a common problem. Constant repetition can transform pristine prayers into pure monotony. To prevent this, the Talmud recommends three responses. First, lose the attitude. Never approach prayer with annoyance, thinking, "Oh no! I have to pray again!" Second, always use gentle and humble words. And finally, add a new insight to each day's prayers. Ultimately, what separates rote from real prayer is attitude, focus and creativity.

This insight is useful for any potentially numbing repetition. First of all, don't treat peak moments casually. No, it's not just another wedding, and a funeral is never something that threw your schedule off.

Language is also key. Even if you've been to 500 shiva houses, that doesn't mean they becomes places to tell jokes and talk about golf. Humble words pave the way for a sincere connection.

And finally, find something new. Often before a funeral, someone describes their mother as a "typical Jewish mother," assuming her story is boring. Yet despite the disclaimer, I search for what made her different. Yes, there may be many Jewish mothers, but isn't it nice to hear about the little things that made this woman unique?

Yes, I've seen it all before. Even so, each rerun still matters. As long as each Jewish mother has a different recipe for chicken soup, as long as each young couple has their own story about how they met, I refuse to allow peak moments to become a dreary routine.

An ode to Jewish educators

Figuring out the secret ingredient that has kept Judaism alive for 4,000 years has always been a great parlour game.

Some say the fact Jews have thrived – not simply survived – in so many places despite so many enemies proves God's special bond with the Jewish people. Others credit the continuing focal point of Israel and promise of a return to Zion, no matter where Jews were scattered. Still others emphasize that as "People of the Book," "the Book" and its ideas have proved to be uniquely transportable, adaptable and enduring.

Gil Troy in Montreal

No matter where you stand on this debate, the unsung heroes in maintaining this chain of transmission have been Jewish teachers. Parents and rabbis often grab the headlines – pro and con. But when you think about the hundreds of hours our children spend with their teachers each year, it is worth contemplating whether we appreciate Jewish educators sufficiently.

Considering the enormity of their task and the impact these teachers have in cultivating seeds of the Jewish future, the answer is "no." Even if Jewish teachers were not overworked and underpaid, there would be no way to repay the magnitude of the community's debt and a child's debt for great teaching.

How do you say "thanks" for transmitting the skill of forming legible letters, for sharing the magic of deciphering those letters, for honing the ability to think clearly and critically, let alone beginning to comprehend the ways of the world, the richness of Torah, the majesty of Jewish history, the relevance of Jewish ethics and the mysteries of spirituality? And let us confess, in most modern overworked and overstressed households, more and more of us farm out more and more obligations to schools, Jewish or otherwise, and expect teachers to compensate for too many of our parental shortcomings.

Of course, teachers in various educational venues perform these miracles daily, and they deserve more glory and gratitude than society offers. But the educator in a contemporary Jewish school faces an even more complex task. All the educators, teachers and administrators, "general" and Jewish studies teachers, Jews and non-Jews, have to add identity-building to their already overwhelming to-do lists.

Moreover, in non-Orthodox Jewish schools, educators often have to navigate around mixed messages, as many parents inject their own ambivalence about their Jewish identities into their children's classrooms. Too many parents, even after deciding to send their children to Jewish schools, warn teachers not to be "too Jewish." Too many parents forget that kids instinctively sense insincerity. To be effective, a Jewish school must clearly stand for something – not heavyhandedly, but also not ambiguously, ambivalently or apologetically.

As the school year winds down, those of us lucky enough to send our kids to Jewish schools should take time to thank these Jewish educators for their lifelong gifts. We should thank the visionary principals, the volunteer lay leaders, the support staff and administrators, the gym teachers and arts specialists, as well as the amazing teachers themselves who make each school community function. Certainly, we should not accept mediocrity and must demand change where improvements are needed, but we must practice "hakarat hatov" – recognizing good work – and make detailed "thank yous" up and down our school corridors.

And while we are at it, let's commit to making next year the "Year of the Jewish Educator," a year-long celebration of Jewish education and the everyday heroes who help shape the next generation. Let's try to improve their training, salaries, ongoing learning, and working conditions – including ensuring that all Jewish educators can afford to send their own children to the schools they teach at. Let's follow the examples of Boston, Chicago and Cleveland and start creating city-wide Jewish education "superfunds," investing in Jewish brains and Jewish souls instead of building new Jewish buildings.

Let's also try to find moments throughout the year to toast educators, support them, and help them help us. And let's all commit to some Jewish learning ourselves – a more educated parent body is one of the keys to building a successful Jewish school, and it's another one of those longstanding secrets to Jewish survival.

Dedicated especially to the miracle workers at Akiva School and Foundation School in Montreal.

A refresher course in political advocacy

The dust has settled on the ill-advised resolution of the British Association of University Teachers to boycott faculty members from two Israeli universities. Thanks to pressure both from within and outside the organization, the AUT rescinded the boycott before ever putting it into play. Good sense prevails, at least until someone kicks up dust again.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Recently, a journalist asked me what we've learned from the AUT debacle. We've learned – yet again – that activism matters. There may be historical moments characterized by absolute powerlessness, but this is not such a moment. We can shift the flow of events.

Some of us came of age in an era marked by political activism. Spurred by the youth-based groundswell of opposition to U.S. military involvement in Vietnam, my generation bit off a roster of social and political issues, and learned how to advocate for change.

On diverse issues that related to local, global and Jewish communities, we took on situations and systems that seemed intractable, but sometimes were not. Soviet Jewry and Soviet dissidents, feminism and Jewish feminism, Israel advocacy and Israeli social reform, urban hunger and homelessness, for example, engaged, and continue to engage, people's best efforts for tikkun olam – repairing the world.

When a group of baby boomer professors recently initiated actions designed to pressure the AUT to revoke the boycott, we were reminded of the political activism of our student years. For many of us, the years before career, mortgage and children were fraught with passions that allowed our ideals and idealism to shape our life commitments. The intervening years were often more placid, not only for some of us, but for North American society generally. When we turned our attention to taking on the AUT, we agreed that it felt good to be back in the saddle.

Sadly, the 21st century has not afforded us the luxury of retreating into private concerns. So, for boomers who need a refresher course, and for Gen-Xers who came after, a brief primer on political activism.

Become educated, and educate your children. The issues of concern to the Canadian Jewish community – issues such as anti-Semitism here and abroad; social justice at home, in Israel, and elsewhere; and commitment to Israel are complex. Each has a long history and intricately connected contemporary circumstances. Slogans are fine for placards and bumper stickers. But informed and nuanced arguments enable us to forge commitments we can live by, and they allow us to persuade others and find solutions. Not simply a matter of knowing facts – although that is important – it's a question of sharpening your skills of critical analysis and argumentation.

Speak out. Write to government leaders and others in a position to effect change. Draft opinion pieces for newspapers and letters to the editor. Be guided by the passion of commitment, but allow your intellect to shape a persuasive and cogent argument. When objectionable things are uttered in your presence, get past your embarrassment and put the issue on the table.

Most importantly, we cannot talk only to those who agree with us, however comfortable that may feel. It takes work to find the right language to claim common ground with a wide swathe of people. But it is essential to go beyond your circle of comfort. For example, we sought and found support against the AUT boycott among colleagues who were deeply ambivalent about Israel, but who saw the boycott as unconscionable ideological coercion. It is important to forge alliances.

Persistence pays off. One letter, one conversation, one argument won't do it. Some battles may be won quickly, and some problems rapidly resolved. But for the deep and abiding issues, there are no quick fixes.

My father, alav hashalom, taught in inner city schools. Although shy, he never refrained from advocating publicly on behalf of what he believed to be right. By the time I was eight years old, he encouraged me to write to my political representatives about things that bothered me, or to bring my ideas about school policy to my teachers and principal. Although I was only 16 when he died, I like to think that his teaching and commitments undergird my own life. Next week is his yahrzeit of his death. This column is in his memory. Yehi zichrono baruch.

Middle East Jews join Germany's community

Germany's Jewish community is a mosaic of various strands, and two of its threads are of Middle Eastern origin.

Parviz (Binyamin) Nambar, an Iranian, and Elie Levy, an Israeli, both from the northern city of Hamburg, personify this phenomenon.

Sheldon Kirshner in Hamburg

Nambar, 72, is a former rug wholesaler, and has lived in Germany for 50 years. Levy, 54, is a mime who has been here for more than two decades.

I have no precise figures as to the number of Iranian and Israeli Jewish residents in this country. But what is fairly clear is that Germany is home to roughly 200 Iranian Jews and probably a few thousand Israeli Jews. They form exotic sub-communities in a 100,000-strong Jewish community largely composed of immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

A familiar figure in Hamburg's Jewish community, whose population is estimated at 4,000, Nambar is a member of a vanishing breed. By his reckoning, 300 Iranian Jews lived in this elegant port 15 years ago. But with the flight of young couples to Los Angeles, New York and Israel, the Iranian Jews of Hamburg have dwindled to 100. The rest can be found in Frankfurt, Pforzheim and Dusseldorf. The Iranians are traditional and insular, their breadwinners tending to be businessmen. They hail from Isfahan, Teheran and Meshad, where Nambar was born.

Meshad has a notorious niche in the annals of the Diaspora. In 1839, Muslim mobs, incited by a blood libel, ransacked the Jewish quarter and threatened to kill its inhabitants. Muslim leaders intervened after extracting a promise from Jews that they would convert to Islam en masse.

As Jadid al-Islam, or New Muslims, they lived as faithful Muslims and gave their children Muslim names. But in secret, they observed Judaism, much like the Marranos of Spain. Uncomfortable with their predicament, many Jadid al-Islam left Meshad, in a pattern of migration that culminated with their immigration to Israel in the mid-1950s.

Nambar, the ex-president of B'nai Brith, was uneasy talking about this incident. But he expressed empathy for the plight of his ancestors. "I think I would have done the same, realistically, had I been in that situation."

He emigrated in 1955 to pursue entrepreneurial opportunities, first in Turkey and Italy and then in Hamburg, where only five Jewish families lived when he turned up.

"It was not easy for me coming here," he acknowledged. "Even now, I sometimes think it was wrong," he said, referring to Germany's central role in the Holocaust.

Laying aside doubts about leaving his parents, Nambar had no compunctions regarding his departure. "Most Muslims in Iran hate Jews, and that's a fact," he claimed.

With bitterness, he still remembers having been told by an Iranian Muslim in 1944 that when the German army conquered the Caucasus and rolled into Iran, Jews would be killed.

Until the 1979 Islamic Revolution, he visited Iran twice a year. On one of his trips, he was introduced to his wife-to-be, Farideh Rebecca, whom he married in 1962.

They have two sons, one of whom works with him. For a long time, when Nambar was a wholesaler of Iranian carpets, he prospered. But when the market declined, he became an agent and an adviser to major buyers.

He enjoys living in Hamburg, his qualms about Germany's Nazi past notwithstanding. "I like the way of life, the cleanliness and the punctuality." He considered making aliyah, but shelved that plan because Israel's climate would not have suited his wife's health.

A German national who still maintains Iranian citizenship, Nambar has business ties with local Muslims from Iran. The two groups seldom mix after hours, but he has been to Muslim weddings and funerals.

He is not sanguine about the longevity of Hamburg's Iranian Jewish community. The young, including one of his sons, are emigrating, secure in the belief their children will have a better future outside Germany.

***

Elie Levy was born in Jaffa and raised in Holon, a Tel Aviv suburb. His parents, Central Asian Jews, immigrated to Israel in 1949. Levy's father cleaned trains in Israel, but his children acquired university degrees.

An animated man who studied mime in France, he did not intend to settle in Germany. "It was never my dream place. It was so far away and complicated."

A German woman he had met brought him here in the early 1980s. Since mimes were not as appreciated by Israelis as by Germans, he stayed on in Germany after his relationship with that woman ended.

Parviz Nambar

Nevertheless, Levy never really thought of Germany as home. "I lived from year to year, always thinking of returning to Israel. I didn't even want to speak German."

In Hamburg, he knows 20 Israelis by name and can recognize another 80.

Fifteen years ago, he met the love of his life, Maria Hofer, 17 years his junior. He was smitten, though their age difference seemed like an insurmountable obstacle.

"She was too young for me, but Maria was the first woman to want me."

Her first impression of him was hardly rapturous, he said, but she was drawn to his brash demeanour. "I fell in love with him at first sight. He was completely different. I just wanted to be with him."

Levy was the first Jew Maria – an industrial designer from Dresden – had ever met, though one of her ancestors, a musician five or six generations removed, was Jewish.

After meeting him, she started studying Hebrew, which she now speaks quite fluently. Wed in a civil marriage in 2000, they remarried in an Orthodox ceremony in 2002, following her formal conversion to Judaism.

"I couldn't imagine, 15 years ago, I would convert," she confessed. "But as I got to know Elie, I realized how important Judaism is to him."

They live in a crowded flat in Eppendorf – a pleasant and leafy neighbourhood in Hamburg – with their two rambunctious children, Yonatan, 2, and Rachel, 4.

To a Canadian visitor, the Levys seem like an odd couple. Elie is talkative and lively and always appears to be performing, while Maria is quiet, reserved and serious.

But if first impressions count, they are compatible and cherish each other's company. After passing a Sabbath wine goblet around the table, she kissed him on the lips in a fulsome display of affection.

To him, Germany is a "wonderful" country with "wonderful" people, all the more reason he cannot fathom what happened here with the rise of Nazism in 1933.

Maria's grandfathers, one of whom was a priest, were both Nazis. They died when she was still an adolescent. She has no idea whether they were anti-Semites, but she is certain her parents are not anti-Semitic.

She is ashamed of the Nazi era, but is honest enough to admit she does not know how she might have behaved as a German under Hitler. "I hope I would have done the right thing and helped Jews," she mused.

Despite his comfortable lifestyle, Levy intends to return to Israel so that his bilingual children can become true Israelis.

"I will go wherever he goes," said Maria, who has visited Israel on numerous occasions and taken stark photographs of its landscapes. "I can imagine living there, but in a place where I can breathe clean air and raise my children under good conditions."

CHAT principal retiring after 15 years

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Sheldon Friedman, who will retire this month from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, has always maintained an open-door policy as an administrator.

"That's one of the reasons I have the jelly beans," the 63-year-old educator said in an interview at his office, referring to the colourful candies in the red bubble gum dispenser on his desk.

CHAT's student council vice-president, Zack Belzberg, told Friedman at a student-organized assembly in his honour, "Your motto is that you respect and trust the kids, and they will give it to you back... Thank you for your trust and your respect."

Expanding on his philosophy in the interview, Friedman said treating staff with respect pays dividends. "That's the way they treated the kids, and I [also] tried to role model that aspect of treating kids with respect.

Sheldon Friedman

"I listen to [the students]. I acknowledge the fact they work hard. I admire the fact they're doing a double curriculum."

Friedman, who started as general studies principal at CHAT before becoming principal of the school's main Tanenbaum campus three years ago, admits to not having been a model student himself at Eitz Chaim's D'arcy Talmud Torah. "I have great respect for Jewish studies teachers. The kids are not as motivated in these courses on a percentage basis... If they have one student like [I was], boy, are they earning their money!"

A native of Tbilisi, whose parents, a tailor and a seamstress, moved the family back to their native Poland after World War II, Friedman arrived in Toronto in 1948 at age 7 via a displaced persons camp in Linz, Austria.

His first teaching job at Central High School of Commerce (now Central High School) appealed to him because he felt comfortable working with immigrant kids, he said.

He returned there as head of history and economics later in his career, and also worked at three other schools – Brockton High School, a technical/vocational school where he was assistant head of history; Lawrence Park Collegiate Institute; and West Toronto Secondary School, where he served as vice-principal – before taking a leave from the Toronto school board to become general studies principal of CHAT in Jan. 1990.

He had applied for the job at the suggestion of a colleague who thought he would be a good candidate. "I wanted to have another experience," he said. "I always liked new challenges."

At the time, Friedman, a father of three sons and a member of a Conservative synagogue, assumed that CHAT would have a student body that was largely Orthodox.

But he found that the students represented a variety of denominational backgrounds, and that there was also a multicultural aspect to the school. "I found the community aspect very attractive," he said. "There were kids from Persia, kids from Russia, even though all of them were Jewish. There was also the English as a second language component."

Friedman said he drew on his experience coaching basketball in the Toronto school system to bring the "team concept" to CHAT staff, promoting the idea that Jewish studies and general studies staff were working together on a common mission.

For Friedman, the biggest change at CHAT was the day school's relatively small size – about 400 or 450 students, compared to up to 2,300 at his previous schools. CHAT now has 850 students, however, and before it opened a second campus in Richmond Hill, there were 1,350 in one location.

Despite the school's longer hours, Friedman found his new job relaxing. He extended his leave twice, then decided to make the move official.

Now, he said, it's time to retire. "I feel comfortable with my decision," he told the students. Future plans include continuing his work as chair of the Committee For Yiddish of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and looking after his grandson on a regular basis, together with his wife.

To honour Friedman, the school is setting up a Holocaust education fund in his name and is holding a reception at the end of this month.

Foundation gives kids in shelters a birthday

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Kids living in emergency or temporary housing in the GTA have had happier birthdays lately, thanks to the Give Kids Foundation, a charity founded by a trio of local women.

Susy Goldstein, Alison Polan and Marlene Axler, who met while volunteering at their children's elementary school, say they established the charity about two years ago because they wanted to do something for the community, and their priority was to help kids.

After "brainstorming" with Axler's son, a youth worker, they realized that although kids in shelters get all the basics, "they get left behind on their birthdays," Axler says.

"Many of these kids are in crisis situations. Some are victims of broken homes, some of violence, some are new immigrants and many are suffering from extreme economic and social hardships," she says.

Since many have to carry around their belongings in a plastic bag, the women came up with the idea of giving the kids knapsacks filled with practical and fun gifts, as well as some necessities appropriate to each child's age and gender.

"We want to promote literacy, so we include an age-appropriate book, and we also include a tuque and some socks, because they often get misplaced. And each knapsack has the child's name on it," Goldstein says.

The women now provide five charities, including Red Door Shelters, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services and Toronto Community Hostel, with about 40 knapsacks a month.

"We shop, pack, deliver and raise money ourselves, and although we've had to recruit people to help us out, everyone is a volunteer," Goldstein says. "We store all our merchandise and hold our meetings at home, so there is no overhead. We're very grassroots."

Money is raised by selling tribute cards and centrepieces, and donations in lieu of birthday party loot bags.

To maintain anonymity, the women have no interaction with shelter residents.

Caravan '05 plans in doubt

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A last-minute effort by Jewish community organizations to mount an Israel pavilion at International Caravan 2005 appears to have come to naught.

Earlier this week, Downsview Park said it was withdrawing as the venue for the international multicultural festival, leaving this year's event in doubt.

In a very brief interview, Kirk Jensen, the president of International Caravan, told The CJN the festival would go ahead, but he gave no details as to a replacement site.

The planned Israeli pavilion would have marked the first time in at least four years that the Jewish community mounted an exhibit at the annual event, which was to run from June 21 to July 4.

UJA Federation spokesperson Howard English said the Consulate General of Israel, the Israel Government Tourist Office, the federation, community centres, youth groups and Zionist organizations had agreed to partner in an Israel pavilion.

But Garth Hardie, a spokesperson for Downsview Park, said International Caravan organizers failed to comply with their contract, and Downsview was withdrawing from the event.

WE WISH OUR GRADUATING CLASS CONTINUED SUCCESS IN THEIR FUTURE EDUCATION

The example of Yoram Sheftel

By RABBI MICHAEL DOLGIN

This week's parshah testifies to the complexity of living a fully engaged life. In the wilderness, our ancestors had far fewer worries. While they faced some enemies and challenges, they clearly knew who their foes were and had clear direction about how to approach them. As soon as scouts were sent to investigate the land of milk and honey, the choices become much more complex. Moses provided the questions and they themselves were required to find the answers. In the Torah, we can clearly see that 10 find the wrong answer and two find the correct one. Life in the land of Israel is as complex as it has ever been.

Rabbinic Reflections

During the week of writing, the challenge of following one's principles in a complex world was exemplified for me by a single individual in Israel: Yoram Sheftel.

I read online of the Israeli Supreme Court decision clearing any major legal hurdles that lay before the disengagement from Gaza, planned for this August. Pictured expressing his disappointment in the court decision was Yoram Sheftel, the attorney who represented the settlers before the court.

Upon seeing his name and picture, I was transported back to the winter of 5758 (1987-88), when I sat in Binyanei HaUma in Jerusalem and witnessed the trial of John Demjanjuk, accused of being Ivan the Terrible, who tortured and killed our people in the death camps. I was there when Demjanjuk himself testified. The emotions stirred by the experience remain with me to this day. He was convicted, and then the conviction was later overturned and he was set free.

Sheftel was his attorney. I can't imagine what it was like to defend someone accused of such horrific crimes. At the time, Sheftel was called both "the most hated man in Israel" and "Israel's conscience."

Now, he represents the settlers of Gaza. It's likely that he will also be described in such opposing terms today.

In the most different situations imaginable, Sheftel has managed to follow his principles. He has looked beyond his personal feelings and past the likelihood of winning or losing to the principles of democracy, responsibility and justice. Each of us may have different feelings about the outcomes of the Demjanjuk trial or the settlers' appeal. Yet, each of us, like the scouts of old, should be inspired by Sheftel's example.

A Jewish life is one of principle and practice. We must seek justice and pursue it here in Canada and in Israel.

Rabbi Dolgin is spiritual leader of Temple Sinai Congregation in Toronto.

Letters from the future

The following personal reflection was written on Jan 14, 2003. The writer died this year on Shabbat, May 7, during the commemorations of the liberation of Auschwitz, where it is likely her entire family and that of her husband perished.

By ANN SZEDLECKI

Guest Voice

A few years ago, I attended a lecture in Toronto during Holocaust Week, and it made me realize how little had been said about the lives of the Jews who found refuge – myself one of them – in the former Soviet Union.

On the spur of the moment, I approached Anita Ekstein, a member of the Toronto Holocaust remembrance committee and expressed my thoughts. She was interested and directed me to Judy Cohen, then-chair of the speakers and survivors committee. We set up an appointment, and Judy Cohen listened to my story. She thought my story was important enough to tell to younger people, and that is how I came to be a speaker at the Holocaust centre.

Since I was a mere child of 14 and the youngest in the family when World War II broke out, I had just finished my elementary school education and was not prepared for the hardship that the future held for me. That's what my life's story is all about.

The main purpose of my involvement now is to convey this idea to the younger people who come to the centre to see the exhibits, watch in horror the videos of the experiments conducted by the Nazis at concentration camps on their inmates, and then listen to my story.

At first I thought that by the time I appeared in front of them to speak, they would be exhausted physically as well as mentally. As it turned out, I was wrong.

I was there in front of them to testify in person what happened to me and how I survived under terrible conditions. I am not claiming that I can compare my life with that of people in ghettos and death camps, but the story also had to be told of how I, at so young an age, all alone, had coped with great hardships.

But my note here is really not so much about my life as about the reaction of the young people who came to the museum, some of them not very well informed and with preconceived thoughts or even doubts, as some of their letters would later point out.

But my first thoughts about one group were quickly dispelled after their visit, and it was with great emotion that I read the letters from Grade 10 students from Peterborough to whom I spoke on Nov. 8, 2002.

Usually I am allotted 45 minutes to speak and another 15 minutes for questions for a total of one hour. However, strangely, this group filed out of the auditorium without asking a single question.

After they left, I felt frustrated. I asked myself if we had exhausted the topic and maybe it was time to get on with our own lives.

But I was in for a great surprise when I received 10 letters from students of that high school. Reading their reaction to my story, I felt exhilarated and delighted, with my trust restored. It seemed that these young people left silently, without asking a single question, not because they were bored or uninterested, but because they were overwhelmed. They must have put themselves in my position: we were the same age when my story began, and they were finding it hard to believe that evil people can do horrible deeds to innocent ones.

Every time I re-read these letters, tears run down my cheeks. They are not signs of sadness, but of hope that maybe, maybe with young people like these, we will face a better future.

I would like to add that I now have a granddaughter who is not much older than I was when my own tragedy began.

Perspectives on the truth

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In the Torah readings at this time we read about the spies that Moses sent to Israel to report on the land, and shortly thereafter we will read about the rebellion against Moses lead by Korach. The two events are not unconnected.

When Moses charges the spies with their duties, he mentions that they need to observe both the people and the land. When they deliver their report, they state that the produce of the land is quite bountiful and large, but it is a land that devours its inhabitants. The commentaries discuss the meaning of this strange phrase, and there is a suggestion put forth that in order to distract the inhabitants and keep them busy, divine timing arranged that there would be many funerals during the days the spies are visiting.

In this way, the inhabitants would not pay attention to the spies, but at the same time the spies are, in fact, watching an unusual number of funerals. They therefore conclude that the land devours its inhabitants.

But according to this view, the spies have in fact reported the truth. If they witnessed an inordinate amount of funerals, then truly they watched a land eat its people. So why are they so condemned for these words?

The problem with the report of the spies is that it dictates a conclusion. Events are meaningful when they are interpreted. Historians spend relatively little time arguing known facts and much more time arguing meaning. The funerals could be seen as indicative of a poisonous land or indicative of divine timing. To report the former is to report with slanderous intent, even if the words themselves are true.

God teaches Israel this lesson when Korach leads a rebellion against Moses and Aaron. In response to the rebellion, the Torah states, the earth opened her mouth and swallowed Korach and his followers. In this instance, the land really did eat a group that was dwelling upon it. The words of the spies came true, but not with regard to the Land of Israel. Ironically, it was true of their current land – the wilderness.

Everything in the universe has both positive and negative aspects. Every event can be read in an infinite number of ways. The sin of the spies was in telling Israel how to "read" the land, thus robbing them of their own individual perspectives.

Rabbi Levi is cited in a midrash as commenting on the book of Ecclesiastes. He relates the parable of a bird that was kept in a cage. Another bird comes and lands on the cage and says to the captive bird, "How happy you must be that the food you require is provided for you." The bird in the cage responds, "All you see is the food. You do not see the bars."

Mezuzah lore

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at some of the intricate laws that go into creating a mezuzah and affixing it to the walls of your home. As you skim through the many mezuzot sites on the Internet, you realize that mezuzot also play a major role in ethical thought, remarkable tales, current affairs and even Jewish humour.

First, the ethical lesson. I like the way the Chabad.org site deals with the following question:

Q. We have young children. Can I place the mezuzah lower, so that they could reach it to kiss it?

A. Do not place the mezuzah lower than the mandated height. Instead, lift your children up to the mezuzah. You'll be instilling in them – and yourself —a valuable lesson: if an ideal is beyond your reach, strive upward toward it, instead of compromising the ideal just because it is beyond your reach. [www.chabad.org/library/article.asp?AID=225405]

That lesson seems to have worked for Belle Rosenbaum. When Rosenbaum was a child, her grandfather used to lift her to kiss the mezuzah. Years later, she began to began to collect mezuzot cases from around the world. Rosenbaum went on to write her doctorate about her collection and to publish a book, Upon Thy Doorposts: The Law, the Lore, the Love of Mezuzot. The next time you are in Jerusalem, make time to visit Jerusalem's Great Synagogue. Inside you'll find the Rosenbaum Mezuzah collection, which numbers 1,000 mezuzot. [www.wzo.org.il/en/resources/view.asp?id=1234]

The mezuzah has long been viewed as having protective qualities. The Jerusalem Talmud tells the story of the Persian king Artvon who sends Rabbi Yehuda HaNasi an expensive stone and requests that the rabbi send him back something of equal value. So the rabbi "wrote a mezuzah and sent it to him in return. When Artvon received the mezuzah, he was perplexed, and said, 'I sent you something of great value, and you send me a cheap piece of parchment in return.' Rabbi HaNasi answered, 'You sent me something for which I will have to hire a watchman to protect it, whereby I sent you something that will offer you protection.'" [www.campsci.com/mezuzah/]

Many remarkable stories have been told about people who have recovered from illnesses after a faulty mezuzah was replaced with a kosher one. In one case, someone suffering from eye problems discovered that the Hebrew words for "your eyes" (aynaychem) had been misspelled in his bedroom mezuzah. When the mezuzah was replaced, the medical problem reportedly disappeared. [www.campsci.com/mezuzah/mzpart1.htm]

It's not often that a mezuzah makes the news. But one did recently when Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon affixed a mezuzah to the doorway of Block 27 in the Auschwitz death camp. [http://tinyurl.com/b5rb2] Sharon's action incensed Michael Handelzalts. He wrote in Ha'aretz newspaper, "Places unfit for human presence should not carry a mezuzah… When the prime minister affixes a mezuzah to a doorpost in Auschwitz, he bluntly highlights the meaninglessness of this religious and cultural Jewish symbol." Handelzalts' comments have provoked wide-ranging debate on the website. [http://tinyurl.com/9bwnd]

The essence of the commandment is the parchment that goes inside the box and not the casing itself. However, the Esek website points out that the decorative container is important, too. "We live in human forms that react to esthetics. If something is attractive, we are more likely to give it honour or care." [www.esek.com/sopher/mezinfo.html]

And that brings us to this final story. A wealthy Jewish man buys a fabulous home in Beverly Hills, Calif. He brings in a local workman to decorate the place. When the job is finished, he goes out and buys 50 mezuzahs and asks the decorator to place them on the right hand side of each door except bathrooms and closets. He's worried that the decorator will chip the paintwork or won't put them up correctly. However, when he comes back a few hours later, he sees that the job has been carried out to his total satisfaction. He's so pleased that he gives the decorator a bonus.

As the decorator is walking out of the door he says, "Glad you're happy with the job…By the way, I took out all the warranties in the little boxes and left them on the table for you!" [http://tinyurl.com/7vy2f]

Have summer camps become too materialistic?

By MAIA FILAR
Special to The CJN

For many young people, going to sleepover camp is the best part of their year – it's an extended vacation when they're allowed to get dirty, spend time with friends and experience some independence from their parents.

And most adults have an image of summer camp as a place where kids can rough it, leaving behind modern conveniences to get back to nature.

But times have changed.

Take a trip to a typical camp this summer and you're bound to see kids wearing expensive clothing, yakking on cellphones, and playing handheld video games. And instead of huddling under the covers with a flashlight and an Archie comic, campers today are more likely to be watching X-Men on a portable DVD player.

Counsellors and parents have begun to take notice of the problem, and some camps are starting to do something about it.

Mark Diamond, director and owner of Camp Manitou, an arts and sports camp in Muskoka, wants to stop the trend before it becomes part of camp culture.

This year, Manitou has sent out a friendly reminder to parents and kids to help them keep in mind what camp is supposed to be about.

It lists what the camp tries to promote – getting away from the city, not worrying about how you look, being social and interacting with others – and what it doesn't want to promote – putting on makeup, wearing expensive clothing or sunglasses, blow drying or straightening your hair, watching movies or playing video games, and using cellphones.

> Time to leave makeup, expensive clothing behind

Diamond acknowledges that adolescence is a hard time, when insecurity may lead many kids to bring these items with them, but he said camp is designed to make kids forget the pressures of city life.

"Camp is a special place where people appreciate you for what really counts," Diamond says. "When [campers] realize, 'Wow! They really like me,' it increases their self-esteem."

But many campers have a hard time seeing past brand labels and the latest must-have gadgets.

One of the best ways to stop this before it takes root is with parental support, but Diamond says getting it isn't always easy.

Most parents are completely supportive of Manitou's efforts, he says, and all parents must sign a contract stating that any contraband items found will be taken away and given to charity.

But some parents let their anxiety get in the way of good judgment.

"Some parents feel insecure when their child leaves and are very concerned," Diamond says. "Therefore, they support their child's reasoning to bring a cellphone. This is a very natural response. What happens then is that children call their parents when they are not home, and [parents], in turn, call back in a panic."

But what's wrong with bringing a cellphone to camp? Or what about the newest in expensive yoga wear if that's what a camper is used to wearing at home?

Of course, there's a time and a place for everything.

Many camps have dances where makeup is permitted, and Shabbat is often a time to wear nicer clothing. There are also nights when an entire camp will watch films as a group, or use computers for a certain activity.

The difference, camp directors and counsellors stress, is that these are communal activities. It's when electronic gadgets or expensive clothing are used in anti-social rather than inclusive ways that they become a problem.

Counsellor Lia Boritz works at Camp Shomria, a casual, kibbutz-style camp near Perth, Ont., that's part of the socialist Hashomer Hatzair movement. She says that in recent years, she's been seeing more electronics and brand name clothing, as well as a greater emphasis on looks, than ever before.

This summer, she hopes to change that.

But because at Shomria, youth teach other youth and adults are not as present in day-to-day activities as they are at some camps, Boritz feels counsellors can't use the same approach that Diamond uses at Manitou.

She says that because she and her co-workers are role models, she's organizing discussion among them about what's appropriate to wear around campers.

Diamond agrees wholeheartedly that counsellors must set the tone, but he thinks role-modelling must also begin at home.

"Why teach your child that it's OK to spend $200 on a pair of sunglasses and have that pressure on them not to lose them?" he asks.

Some parents leave it up to their kids to learn from their own mistakes.

One Shomria mother thought it would be inappropriate for her daughter to bring her hair-straightener to camp, but she couldn't convince the 13-year-old.

It was only once the teen was swimming and playing sports at camp that she noticed she wasn't thinking twice about her hair.

"She went to camp and realized how stupid it was [to bring the hair-straightener]," her mother says.

Most parents say the materialism connected to summer camp has become a sore spot – and a struggle with their children over basic values.

Diamond and Boritz agree that parents need to stand firm when it comes to a camp's and their own rules, as well as make sure that what kids bring to camp accords with its activities.

"At Manitou we start with the staff," Diamond says.

That means he makes sure his counsellors follow all the rules set out for the campers, and he expects parents to do the same.

"They are the kids' role models, and kids always follow their mentors."

High conflict families symposium a first

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A recent symposium about high conflict families with separation and divorce was one of the first of its kind in Canada, says Howard Hurwitz, conference chair and director of children's services at Jewish Family and Child Service.

The focus of the symposium, sponsored by JF&CS in conjunction with Children's Services Network, North Quadrant, was to bring together professionals to raise awareness about high conflict families, says Hurwitz.

These families have been involved in unresolved litigation for a number of years, and have been seen by a multitude of communal agencies or professionals.

Existing research indicates that about 10 per cent of separating or divorcing families in North America become involved in the legal system regarding child custody, he says, but there is limited empirical data for Toronto and Ontario that identifies the prevalence of high conflict families.

"The parents [involved] are typically at [war with each other] and have often called the police. [In other instances] one parent or another has made allegations of abuse," he says.

"These allegations are often unsubstantiated, but they may call our agency because they are trying to position themselves for upcoming litigation. As a children's aid society, we have to investigate each complaint."

A constant in each family, says Hurwitz, is that the children experience emotional and psychological difficulties while the parents are in conflict.

"They could have behavioural problems at school, or they could be depressed, socially isolated or withdrawn. In extreme cases kids run away from home. We [worry about] children who are put in the middle of warring parents."

These cases demand a lot of professional time, he says, "and we are concerned about poor outcomes. We think that things can be done better."

The two-day symposium was attended by lawyers, mental health professionals, child welfare workers, teachers, police and judges, and was limited to 150 people.

"Our objective was to provide training, to identify best-practice approaches – what works and what does not, and to stay focused on the needs of the children," Hurwitz says.

Among the recommendations that arose from the symposium, he says, was to try to identify high risk families, and intervene as soon as possible.

"Those working with these families need support and education, and the professionals need to collaborate and share information.

"Legal issues should also be resolved quickly, and there must be clear, structured parenting plans and court orders with regards to custody, access and treatment with clear consequences for noncompliance.

"We also talked about a comprehensive treatment model that provides service and help for all family members, and about advocating for more treatment resources for families of limited income," he says.

A follow-up symposium is planned for next year, says Hurwitz, and a group of professionals has committed to developing a "best practice" document.

"Our objective is to assist parents throughout the separation and divorce period without having the children become casualties to the break-up of marital relations."

Bridge teacher to celebrate 90th birthday

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Fanny (Babe) Smith, who will be 90 in August, teaches bridge and lives an active and productive life.

She is an avid Scrabble player, loves to read, creates wall hangings, photo montages, knits and crochets, and she has put together a comprehensive family tree. She says her only complaint is that she doesn't have enough time to do all the things that she wants to do.

"I am a big optimist and I am lucky to have good health. And what can be nicer than playing with great-grandchildren and hearing them laugh?"

To answer questions from her grandchildren about her childhood in South Africa, Smith wrote a 128-page life story. She begins her memoirs in 1883, with her parents who were born in Zhager, Lithuania, which was then part of Russia.

Her father, Jacob Schlom Cohen, immigrated to South Africa in 1903 at the age of 20, leaving his entire family behind in Lithuania. He entered a partnership in a general store in Edenvale, now part of Johannesburg, and sent for his wife, Paulina, the following year. Smith was the fifth child of a family of six.

"I told my grandchildren what it was like for us when I was a child – no electric lights, no running water, no motor cars, and we travelled by horse and cart," she says. But as the years passed, the family came to live a life of leisure.

In 1939, at the age of 24, she married Alec Smith, who was a legal bookie.

"Although my husband died at the age of 48, I was lucky to have married such a wonderful, kind man." This is the kind of half-full, not half-empty, philosophy Smith has about everything.

"I never cooked a meal until I came to Canada," she says. "We had four full-time help and my maid brought me breakfast in bed." She describes her days in South Africa as filled with golf, badminton, exercise, country clubs, travelling and a rich family life.

She recalls watching adults playing bridge when she was a child and from time to time, they invited her to join them. Not until after her husband died did she begin playing in competitive bridge tournaments, and winning prizes and trophies.

In 1965, she began teaching bridge in Durban and Johannesburg. Now, 40 years later, at Babe's Bridge School, she still teaches individuals and small groups.

With the political upheavals in South Africa, her daughter, Glenda David, was the first of her three children to come to Canada in 1982 with her husband and daughters. They were followed by son Stephen Smith and daughter Hazel Broker and their families.

After several visits to her children and grandchildren in Toronto, Smith decided to leave her life of comfort behind and to begin a new life, in 1986, at the age of 70. "I never regretted it," she said at an interview in her apartment in a seniors' residence. Her walls are covered with memorabilia and her tables with meticulously organized scrapbooks.

Although she now cooks, bakes and does housework, she says, "Canada has been so wonderful to me. Here, I have peace of mind."

David, the office manager of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, says, "I want the world to know about my amazing mother. Having lived the easy life in South Africa, she made the transition to having to do all the mundane things that throughout her adult life she had never taken care of." David adds that her mother does them with joy.

"Mother is perhaps a candidate for the Guinness Book of World Records as the oldest bridge teacher. She has cognizant ability and abounding patience. I treasure the time we have together – my mother lives in the 21st century. She is an amazing role model."

Smith's greatest happiness comes from her family – eight grandchildren and three great-grandchildren. "I'm so lucky that we are all here," she says.

Looking back, Smith says the "most awesome thing" to her is computers. "A cellphone is as far as I got."

But knowing Smith, she might soon be playing competitive bridge on computer.

Young Jewish Kenyan makes his home in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Although John Ngindiru grew up in his native Kenya with a love of Judaism, he hesitated to attend synagogue in Winnipeg during the first few months he was here.

"I was worried that I wouldn't be able to convince anyone here that I am Jewish," said Ngindiru (the N is silent).

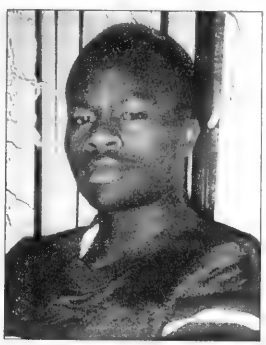
"I spoke to my rabbi about getting a letter from another rabbi in Kenya, but I didn't have time to do that before I left."

For Sukkot in 2003, he got up the courage to try the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, a Conservative shul and Winnipeg's largest congregation.

"I was amazed at the welcome I received," he said.

Since then, he has tried to attend shul on Shabbat as often as he can.

In recent weeks, he has been going to the Orthodox Chavurat Tefila Shul in the city's north end, because it's a couple of blocks from his home.



John Ngindiru

The 23-year-old Ngindiru came to Winnipeg in December 2002 mainly to escape having to join a government-supported gang of thugs that he compares to the Mau Mau, the Kenyan rebel group of the 1950s.

It was the kind of situation where if you join, you can never leave, and if you don't join, you could be murdered, he said.

Family and friends helped him leave the country and he came to Winnipeg under the auspices of the University of Manitoba. He applied to the university and was accepted, but he can't afford the tuition to continue.

He's now working for a biotechnology company and sending whatever money he can spare back home to help pay for school for his nine younger brothers and sisters.

Ngindiru was born in Nakuru, a town in Kenya's Rift Valley to a subsistence farming family that later moved to nearby Kericho. (His father grows coffee, bananas, maize and tomatoes.)

In the early 1960s, several thousand members of the Agikuyu, a people in Western Kenya, became Jewish. His parents converted in the early 1980s, when he was two years old.

The group takes its Judaism very seriously, he said. According to Ngindiru, his people keep kosher – they eat only meat that is ritually slaughtered and won't eat the meat of animals that die of natural or other causes – and they don't marry outside the group.

They spend most of Shabbat in their wooden synagogues.

"The children come at 8:00 a.m. to learn the basics, with the adults coming at 9:00 a.m.," he said.

They live in their sukkahs for all of Sukkot and celebrate all the holidays. They receive Torah lessons from Israel. While they don't know Hebrew, they conduct their services in English and their native Kikuyu language.

"We are proud of our faith," Ngindiru says. "We put Stars of David and menorahs on our cars. And we are always excited to have Jewish visitors."

Ngindiru has even faced discrimination because he is Jewish. A school he was attending, which was run by Catholics, tried to expel him because he wouldn't attend classes on Shabbat, but the director of education wouldn't allow the school to expel him because of his religious beliefs.

He said he phones his family frequently. "My parents are really happy that I'm here. They think this is the opportunity of a lifetime. Maybe it's God's will that I don't go to school but instead help my sisters and brothers to get their education. As long as I can go to synagogue, I feel great."

RCMP, CSIS to investigate alleged Hamas front group

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Anne McLellan, the minister of public safety and emergency preparedness, has asked the RCMP and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) to look into an Islamic charity that is suspected of being a fund-raising front for the banned terrorist organization Hamas.

Anne McLellan

McLellan recently asked the two security agencies to investigate allegations that IRFAN, the International Relief Fund for the Afflicted and Needy, is merely continuing the operations of the banned Jerusalem Fund for Human Services. The Jerusalem Fund is allegedly one of four "fronts" for terror groups named in a secret Privy Council Office memo that was sent to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien on May 23, 2000.

Last November, the Canadian Coalition for Democracies (CCD), Conservative MP Stockwell Day and Israeli researcher David Bedein held a news conference in which they alleged IRFAN was the old Jerusalem Fund dressed in new garb. They relied on information published by the Israel-based Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center at the Center for Special Studies, which reported that IRFAN was "a Hamas front organization operating in Canada to enlist financial support for Hamas institutions in the Palestinian Authority-administered territories."

The CCD has been urging federal authorities since that time to crack down on IRFAN. In a letter to CCD president Alastair Gordon on June 8, which was provided to The CJN, McLellan, who also serves as deputy prime minster, wrote that she had turned over the file to the RCMP and CSIS.

"It is a matter of grave concern to me that those who engage in terrorist activities may seek to take advantage of Canada's laws, including the law relating to registered charitable organizations, to facilitate fund raising and other activities in support of terrorism. It is important that we retain the integrity of Canada's laws," McLellan stated.

> 'It is important that we retain the integrity of Canada's laws'

McLellan added that she had forwarded CCD correspondence concerning IRFAN to the RCMP and CSIS "for their review and to take action as deemed appropriate."

According to the Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center, IRFAN "enlists contributions and transfers the funds to Hamas' civilian infrastructure in the Palestinian Authority-administered territories. The infrastructure, financed by the donations from Canada and other countries, helps Hamas establish itself as an alternative to the PA and to maintain its terrorism-supporting apparatus."

At the time of the November news conference, IRFAN spokesperson Rasem Abdel-Majid denied the organization was connected to the Jerusalem Fund or was a supporter of Hamas.

However, a quick Internet search revealed that IRFAN maintains the same fax number and mailing address as the Jerusalem Fund.

The Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center also reported that IRFAN operates from the same address as did the Jerusalem Fund and uses the same telephone number at its east Jerusalem office while employing the same person in the office.

Documents filed with the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA), Canada's tax authority, revealed that in 2003, IRFAN allocated about $5.6 million "on programs outside Canada."

IRFAN reported that it received nothing in tax-receipted gifts but raised $2.5 million "from other registered charities" and $2 million from fundraising. It also held $1.5 million in cash or short term bank accounts.

In 2002, IRFAN disbursed $2.9 million to recipients outside Canada. It raised $3.1 million in tax-receipted gifts and $1.5 million in other gifts.

In 2000, the first year for which there are CRA documents on IRFAN, the organization raised only $21,385 and disbursed $13.

Thornhill MP calls committee report 'backward step'

Meanwhile, the German Canadian Congress (Ontario), the Ukrainian Canadian Congress and the Canadian Islamic Congress all endorsed the committee's recommendations.

In a statement, the UCC said, "Canada's war crimes program has abused the citizenship revocation process for political purposes, which has led to fundamental breaches of individual rights and freedoms and has brought Canada's justice system into disrepute."

Commenting on the report, Volpe said the current system is fair. "Somebody doesn't just say, 'You've lied, so therefore you've lost.' Everything is responsible and accountable," the Ottawa Sun quoted him as saying.

Hedy Fry, a member of the parliamentary committee, wrote a dissenting opinion, saying "revocation is not prosecution of a crime" and the standard should remain the civil "balance of probabilities" test. She also rejected penalties other than citizenship revocation in cases of misrepresentation.

A government source confirmed that Fry's view closely mirrors that of the minister.

Thornhill MP Susan Kadis called the committee report "a backward step in many areas."

Echoing Fry's dissenting view, she said the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled that the balance of probabilities is an appropriate standard in revocation cases.

"This report is fundamentally flawed and very seriously puts at risk the whole objective of ensuring that we do not provide a safe haven to those persons involved or complicit in war crimes, genocide or crimes against humanity," Kadis stated.

Morgan noted the current system usually works in a suspect's favour. If the court rules against them, they can appeal to cabinet, but if the Crown loses, it has no recourse for appeal.

He said immigrants don't have a right to live in Canada, but are given permission to do so.

If they defraud the system, that permission can be revoked, he added.

Morgan suggested that any changes to the legislation should only affect future cases, while cases already in the system should be dealt with under current rules.

Campaign launched for Tegegne's transplant

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – An Israeli hospital has agreed to perform a life-saving kidney transplant for Baruch Tegegne of Montreal using an organ donated – free of charge – by an Indian man.

That's the good news. The bad news is that $120,000 (US) must be raised to cover the total costs, says Simcha Jacobovici, the Toronto-based filmmaker who has been advocating on behalf of Tegegne, an Ethiopian Jew.

The hospital, Rambam Medical Centre in Haifa, has agreed in writing to do the surgery for a fee of $70,000, which Jacobovici calls "very discounted… It normally charges $100,000. That's because of Baruch's role in helping Ethiopian Jewry."

However, when travel costs, dialysis for Tegegne, and accommodations, care and other expenses are factored in, at least another $50,000 is needed, Jacobovici said.

In March, the Royal Victoria Hospital (RVH) said it would not do the transplant for Tegegne, 61, because the prospective live donor is not related to him, and is, in fact, a stranger. There is no way of verifying whether or not payment would change hands, and buying and selling organs is illegal in Canada.

Thirty-year-old Shree Dhar said he will accept no compensation for the donation, other than covering his expenses and the time he loses from making a living.

The RVH said it has never performed a transplant using an "altruistic" donation and, moreover, it has concerns because Dhar was found through the Internet and is from a Third World country.

Jacobovici has been unable so far to find another Canadian hospital willing to do the transplant. He found Dhar by placing an ad on Tegegne's behalf on www.matchingdonors.com, a site that matches persons willing to give an organ without personal benefit to those in need.

Tegegne, who is hailed as a hero of the rescue of Ethiopian Jewry, has advanced kidney disease as a complication of diabetes. He has been on the RVH's kidney transplant waiting list for a year and undergoes dialysis four times a week at the Jewish General Hospital.

Jacobovici believes Quebec medicare should at least pay for Tegegne's post-operative care on the grounds that he was forced to go elsewhere for a procedure not available here.

Although Tegegne has Israeli citizenship, he is not eligible for the national health program because he has not been paying into it, Jacobovici said.

A number of American hospitals are also willing to do the transplant using Dhar's kidney, but they asked from $200,000 to $300,000 for the operation alone, Jacobovici said. Having the operation in Israel is preferable, in any case, because Tegegne has a support system of friends and family there.

"Time is of the essence," he stressed. "I'm very worried about him. He has better weeks and worse weeks, but this campaign has given him hope. He feels he's not alone."

Rambam, founded in 1938 as a British military hospital, is one of Israel's five major hospitals. Today it is a teaching hospital affiliated with the Technion, and treats many non-Israelis including thousands of citizens of southern Lebanon and United Nations peacekeeping forces.

The Toronto-based Canadian Friends of Rambam Medical Centre has set up a fund specifically to collect donations to enable Tegegne to have the transplant, and tax receipts will be issued, Jacobovici said.

The Ethiopian Jewish community in Israel has so far raised $20,000, Jacobovici said, which is remarkable given they are generally "low on the economic totem pole."

Another $20,000 approximately, has been pledged in the United States through the Sha'arei Dayah Foundation of St. Paul, Minn., much of it coming from those who are aware of Tegegne's role in the Ethiopian Jewish struggle.

The foundation has created a website (www.TransplantNow.org) to publicize Tegegne's plight. His dramatic story was told in Jacobovici's 1983 documentary Falasha: Exile of the Black Jews.

The search for small-town Jews

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Owen Sound, which has a population of 21,000, is Canada's smallest community with an active synagogue.

The synagogue, Beth Ezekiel, and Grey Roots, a heritage and visitor centre, are joining forces to create an exhibit to showcase the town's 100-year Jewish history.

Currently, the exhibit is in the research and information-gathering phase and Karin Foster, the Grey County archivist, is calling on members of the community and Jews abroad who may have had grandparents and great-grandparents from the area to donate pictures and artifacts to the exhibit.

"We're interviewing people in the community to find out what they can tell us about Owen Sound history. We're trying to fill out the timeline," Foster said.

The panels will display everything from thriving local Jewish businesses to Jewish war veterans who fought and died in battle. But Foster says the organizers are having problems finding people from the early 1900s.

Jeff Elie, Beth Ezekiel president, emphasized how essential it is to find out about the first 30 years of the 20th century, about the Jewish pioneers. He said he has reason to believe that a man named Goldblat, who once owned an Owen Sound furniture store in the late 1800s, might have been a pioneer. Unfortunately, Goldblat is a common name, making it difficult to track down his living family.

"We find it fascinating," said Elie. "Who are the Jews that first came to the area? How did they maintain their Jewishness, considering the problems we face today when attempting to raise our children in the 21st century?"

Both Foster and Elie hope that when the exhibit does open to the public in the fall of 2006, it will offer the community general information that people, Jews and non-Jews alike, may not know about the religion and culture.

Foster said she expects the exhibit to be as successful as a black history exhibit that Grey County put together a few years ago.

Elie is also optimistic that the project will be well-received as "the community at large has taken a positive interest in Jewish causes."

Despite the town's positive response to the exhibit, he believes the community still has a lot to learn about Judaism.

"Owen Sound has very little knowledge of the Jewish community, however this has been changing over the years. Jewish people used to keep a low profile. This exhibit will be an education for people in Owen Sound," Elie said.

"It's surprising how little people know about Judaism if they haven't been exposed."

Elie recalled leading a trip with boy scouts and when he asked the boys if they knew what a Jew was, he was surprised by their response.

"Most of them had no idea what it meant to be a Jew."

Foster said this exhibit is ideal for people, like her, who want to stay informed, aware and "learn new things about what you thought you already knew.

"Jewish people know that the Torah is the first five books of the Bible. Christians may not know that. It's important to know about the similarities and the differences."

She also described an attempt to outline the cultural and traditional differences between Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews. She says while they do practise different customs, the bottom line is that they are all Jewish first.

There is also an attempt being made to highlight parts of Judaism that have little to do with religion, such as Jewish humour and food.

"The exhibit will do a lot to raise consciousness in the wider community," Elie said. "Once ignorance goes away, so should anti-Semitism."

He quickly added that while he has yet to experience anti-Semitism in his town, he does not doubt that it is still a problem that should be addressed.

"We need to dispel the myths and ignorance that people are bound to have, although I have never experienced it in this city."

Elie said that four years ago, the shul was struggling with a congregation of only 13 families. Today, the membership has tripled to more than 50 families, including people from outlying areas, cottage owners and retirees who moved to Owen Sound.

To contact the organizers with information about the town's Jewish history, call 519-376-5140, ext. 113, or toll-free, 1-877-473-9766.

CLC seeks end to Israel's security fence and settlements

The final form dropped a clause calling for the CLC to "work to end all acts of violence that take the lives of innocent Israeli and Palestinian peoples," that came from CUPE, as well one calling for "an immediate cessation of the the Israeli armed attacks on civilian people and the ending of the siege on villages, towns and cities," which came from the B.C. federation.

It does include a general wish that the peace process be based on "equality between Israelis and Palestinians."

During the plenary session on international affairs, only one delegate spoke briefly about the need to support the end of Israel's occupation and the creation of an independent "secular and democratic" Palestinian state. "Palestine" was also featured in a video as one of the countries where the CLC is active.

The proposed resolution is far more temperate than the two-page statement on the conflict issued by the CLC executive committee and council at the last convention in 2002 in Vancouver.

That statement, which was an addendum to a more moderately worded resolution calling for a cessation of violence, compared the situation in Israel to apartheid South Africa and denounced "aggressive" Israeli military actions in Palestinian areas that Israel "justifies as 'hunting down terrorists.'"

"The Palestinians have about the same rights, freedoms and power as Africans living in Bantustans and segregated townships once had," the statement read. It continued that "an occupied people have the right to fight for their freedom" and Palestinian refugees should be compensated for property "lost in Israel."

Unions' triennial convention

While it also condemned the killing of Israeli civilians and the "gross incompetence" of the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat and the PA leadership, the statement sparked outrage in the Jewish community, with condemnations from Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada. Former CLC president Dennis McDermott, since deceased, called it "Israel-bashing."

Paul Purrit, the CLC's international department program director, told The CJN he did not understand the uproar the statement caused in the Jewish community, because it was "quite well-balanced" and, in terms of policy, if not language, not much different from the position of Israel's Labor Party.

Purrit, who is Jewish, has been to Israel and the Palestinian territories frequently since 1985, and as recently as last year. He has been involved with a CLC educational project in the West Bank on occupational health and safety.

In the months that followed, CLC president Ken Georgetti met with then CJC president Keith Landy and then Israeli ambassador to Canada Haim Divon, and Georgetti, along with the heads of CUPE and the Public Service Alliance of Canada, visited Israel and the PA.

Purrit described the trip as "an eye-opener" for the Canadian labour leaders.

The CLC has more than three million members through its affiliated labour federations, unions and district councils. (Its membership does not include the historically anti-Israel Quebec federations, the Confédération des Syndicats Nationaux or the Centrale des Syndicats Démocratiques, but the less-political Féderation des Travailleurs du Québec is an affiliate.)

Israelis, Palestinians share lunch at labour conference

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two executive committee members of the Histadrut, Israel's General Federation of Labour, Shula Cohen and Jihad Akel, who is Arab, were among the international guests at this year's Canadian Labour Congress convention.

The CLC has historic ties with Histadrut, which has sent observers to many conventions since the CLC's founding in 1956, but has not been present since 1996, said Paul Purrit, the CLC's international department program director.

Histadrut has always been invited, but its non-acceptance was due to the former chair placing less priority on international relations than current chair, Amir Peretz, said Cohen, who is chair of the Karmiel Regional Labour Council.

Cohen was not aware of the CLC's position on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict that it adopted in 2002, but she was taken aback when informed that it had used apartheid as a comparison. She thinks Histadrut should be "speaking more loudly" internationally about Israel's position.

Histadrut's new direction has led to renewed relations with the Palestine General Federation of Trade Unions (PGFTU) since April, which were forged in a 1995 agreement but had been suspended since the start of the intifadah in 2000, she said.

The PGFTU, which represents 80,000 workers on the West Bank and Gaza, has been attending CLC conventions since 1992, and was represented this year by Sami Younis, treasurer of the health workers union in Nablus.

Younis welcomed the CLC's desire to find a peaceful solution to "a problem between two nations."

The two Israelis and Younis, who had not met previously, quickly became friendly at the CLC convention. "You see we have lunch together, we can laugh together," said Cohen. Their common language was Arabic.

"We are workers, we are unionists," said Younis, indicating that their common concerns in this area come before politics.

"If speaking about peace makes us politicians, we are politicians," said Akel, chair of Histadrut's "situation room" in Tel Aviv.

The three said they would welcome CLC support for joint activities between Israeli and Palestinian workers. Purrit responded: "The day they ask, we will be there tomorrow."

The three sat down for an interview with The CJN, with Younis acting as interpreter because Akel does not speak English and Cohen's is rudimentary.

Akel and Younis spoke briefly to the convention, with Younis acting as interpreter, expressing a desire to "stop the suffering and see smiles on the faces of Palestinian and Israeli children."

Today, Histadrut represents about 40 per cent of Israeli workers, down from a peak of 85 per cent. About 10 per cent of its membership is Arab, Cohen said.

Both Cohen and Akel were struck at how similar the domestic issues discussed at the CLC convention are to those that preoccupy Israeli workers, such as privatization and globalization.

What Hamas really means by 'occupation'

During the worst years of the second intafadah (2000-2004), each Palestinian attack against Israeli civilians would invariably be followed by an interview with a spokesperson for a "militant" group, such as Hamas or Islamic Jihad, whose organization "took credit" for the violence.

The militants' comments were always the same: "We are fighting the occupation."

Rarely did reporters ask for a definition of "occupation." To most Westerners (at least those who accept a two-state solution for Israelis and Palestinians), it means Israel's presence in the West Bank and Gaza.

But Hamas and Islamic Jihad believe that all of historic Palestine, and especially Israel, is occupied. They consider the land a sacred Islamic trust that must be "liberated" from Jewish sovereignty.

Recently, some analysts have argued that Hamas may be prepared to accept a long-term, although impermanent, hudna or ceasefire with Israel.

Others warn that such a deal, even if offered, would be a dangerous chimera.

It's interesting that Stewart Bell's front-page National Post story, "Hamas Vows Terror" (June 13), tackles this subject head on. In an interview with Hamas spokesperson Sami Abu Zahri in Gaza City, Bell repeatedly asks what Hamas really means by "occupation."

Bell writes that, according to Zahri, "Hamas had no intention of stopping its killings [of Israelis], despite Israel's planned withdrawal from Gaza this summer, adding that violence would continue until Palestinians controlled 'all' of Israel's land mass."

Asks Bell: "The Hamas vision has always been one Palestine, from the Jordan River to the sea. Is that still the case, or has Hamas modified its position?"

Answers Zahri: "There is no problem [with a] step-by-step solution to the Israeli-Arab conflict. We can now accept Gaza and West Bank; in the future, all [of] Palestine."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Bell did get an admission that by "occupation," Zahri means that Israel itself is occupied land. Zahri also added that if Israelis want to live under the Palestinian Authority, they are welcome to do so.

Referring to Hamas' recent success in Palestinian municipal elections (widely viewed as the reason Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is postponing national elections originally scheduled for July 17), Bell wrote about Hamas' call for an end to its designation as a terrorist organization by western countries, including Canada, the United States and the European Union.

This is a call for legitimacy, despite the fact Hamas insists on continuing its attacks on Israeli civilians, and despite the fact the Palestinian Authority is unwilling or unable to disarm Hamas (and Islamic Jihad), as required by the internationally backed "road map" peace plan – in short, despite the fact Hamas may not be willing, as some Western analysts argue, to transform itself from a terrorist organization with one overarching aim: the elimination of Israel.

* * *

Peter Bergen, author of Holy War, Inc.: Inside the Secret World of Osama bin Laden, has been a familiar face on CNN as the network's terrorism analyst since 2001. He is famous for his 1997 CNN interview with bin Laden.

Bergen has a well-established reputation for clear, factual analyses about Al Qaeda and the terrorist threat it continues to pose to the West.

All the more strange then to read Bergen's positive review of The Power of Nightmares, a three-hour BBC documentary about the war on terrorism, in The Nation magazine (June 20).

Bergen explains that the documentary argues that "much of the [terrorism] threat is a fantasy," a fabrication of U.S. political interests, especially neo-conservatives who have allegedly been front and centre in promoting the "war on terrorism." He says the BBC "blows it when [it] concludes that Al Qaeda is a phastasmagorical construct of U.S. officials," but he nonetheless insists The Power of Nightmares is intellectually and historically "probing."

Although Bergen strongly disagrees with most of the ideas presented in the documentary – he writes that it sometimes has "the feel of a Noam Chomsky lecture channeled by Monty Python" – he concludes "it is a richly rewarding film."

The only reason Bergen offers to justify a conclusion that flies in the face of his criticisms is that the documentary "treats its audience as adults capable of following complex arguments" – even, apparently, arguments that are flat-out wrong.

Jewish Canadian studies program launched at U of O

Sara and Zeev Vered donate $1 million to university

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — University students interested in delving into the world of Jewish education can now acquire a distinctively Canadian flavour of that knowledge, in the nation's capital, thanks to one man's vision and a generous grant.

Prominent Ottawa family Sara and Zeev Vered donated $1 million to the University of Ottawa to create the Vered Jewish Canadian Studies Program. It's an interdisciplinary program that will be the first post-secondary education Jewish education curriculum in Canada that focuses on the history, culture and literature of the Jewish Diaspora in Canada.

There are other Jewish education programs at Canadian universities – McGill, York and Concordia – but this one will be the first that doesn't centre on Judaism and Middle East politics.

"This will focus on Jewish people in Canada and how they contributed to Canadian society and the various difficulties they had," U of O President Gilles Patry told The CJN, adding that there is the potential to offer some of the 12 to 15 courses in Hebrew. "We are meeting the need that exists to focus on Jews in Canada."

The U of O was founded by Catholic priests and is now trying to position itself as "Canada's University." The new program will have students from all backgrounds, according to the brains behind the program, U of O Institute of Canadian studies director Pierre Anctil.

"The planned program will be open to students from all interests and disciplines who wish to deepen their knowledge of the Jewish community and its contribution to the development of Canada," Anctil said.

Anctil is not Jewish, but is well-known among the French-speaking Jewish community. He writes and speaks Yiddish, English and French fluently. The Canadian Jewish Congress honoured him in 1998 with the Ezekiel Hart Award, which the CJC gives every three years to a person not from the Jewish community who has contributed in an outstanding way to inter-cultural relations. He has authored many historical studies on the Montreal Jewish community and multi-ethnic context.

According to Patry, a Jewish program was in the works since the late 1990s, however, it wasn't until Anctil joined the U of O last year that the program took on a distinctively Canadian flavour.

For their part, the Vereds, who are intensely private people, spoke at an afternoon unveiling at the U of O, June 16.

"We are pleased to be able to support this exciting new program," said Sara Vered. "We strongly believe in the University of Ottawa's plans to build a sustainable program of scholarship in Jewish Canadian Studies on a national scale."

Renowned scholar, writer and historian Irving Abella delivered an address on the importance of Jewish Canadian studies at the afternoon unveiling.

The planned program, according to the U of O, will initially offer undergraduate and graduate courses, exploring topics such as contemporary Canadian Jewry; English and French language Jewish literature and culture; Canadian Yiddish literature and culture; relations of the Jewish-Canadian community with its non-Jewish environment; social, economic and ethical contributions of Canadian Jews to Canada; and major east European migrations of the early 20th century.

It will be housed under the Institute of Canadian Studies and is expected to start admitting students for the fall of 2006.

Kulanu: 'Serving kosher fruit since 2002'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Heimish, with a twist. That's how the University of Toronto student who founded Kulanu Toronto in 2002 would describe the events run by the gay Jewish campus group.

"All of our events are kosher and have a Jewish feel, with the extra twist of being queer," Dan Heller, 21, explains. (The term "queer" is often used by those in the gay community as an umbrella term for lesbians, gays, bisexuals, transgender, transsexual, intersex, queer and questioning – a group sometimes referred to as LGBTTIQQ.)

Kulanu, which runs under the auspices of Hillel of Greater Toronto, will take part in the Pride Parade this Sunday and have an information table at the event. They'll be recognizable by their t-shirts bearing the slogan, "Serving Kosher Fruit Since 2002." The parade is part of the annual week-long Pride Toronto event.

But Kulanu members kicked off their Pride celebrations early with a Shabbat dinner June 9 that attracted 31 people. The dinner, held at the Wellesley Community Centre, marks their first Friday night dinner this year not held at Hillel's Wolfond Centre.

An alumnus of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Heller, Kulanu's student co-ordinator, said Kulanu was created to meet a need for "a place where we could be both Jewish and LGBT."

The group's website says its programming is apolitical, however, in accordance with Hillel's mandate – and in contrast to a significant number of non-Jewish gay groups that have taken up the left-wing's pro-Palestinian/anti-Israel stance – Kulanu is supportive of Israel and its right to existence. "That doesn't mean that each member of the group will endorse all of Israel's policies," said Heller. "We are a diverse group."

Kulanu's immediate predecessor, JLGBT, which was also connected with Hillel, had folded. Other Jewish gay organizations in Toronto, dating back to 1975, had also folded, said Heller. Kulanu's membership – it has a listserv of 200 – ranges in age from 18 to early 30s, but most are in their 20s.

"I think it's very important that we have Kulanu," said Lisa Isen Baumal, director of Hillel's Wolfond Centre. "[Our] goal is to be able to offer a wide enough array of programs and opportunities that something speaks to everyone."

Kulanu's social, religious and educational events, all of which are supported and promoted by Hillel, include Shabbat dinners, Jewish holiday celebrations, and cultural events.

A third seder this year featured a specialized, more inclusive Haggadah. "Often, queer Jews feel invisible not only in the liturgy but in Jewish life," said Heller. Heterosexuals take for granted things like having an aliyah to acknowledge a special anniversary, he said.

"A lot of what Kulanu is about is bringing Jews who would feel excluded back to a positive self-image, both as Jews and as queers, and to give Judaism a positive image in their eyes as well."

Heller says he has struggled with stereotyping of gays. "What is so striking is that the Jewish community and the queer community both draw from such a diverse group of people."

Students riding across Canada to fight cancer

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

While most university students toil away all summer to make money for the next year's tuition and rent, four students from Toronto are doing something much more exciting.

Shael Zelunka, Ryan Richards, Travis Buckley and Cyrus Salek are biking across Canada to raise money for the breast cancer centre at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre in honour of Ryan's mother Robbin, who has been battling breast cancer for 13 years.

The men, who are now following the Trans-Canada Highway across Northern Ontario, began their trek on May 5 when they dipped their tires in the Pacific Ocean in Victoria. They plan to reach the Atlantic before the end of July.

Richard's goal is to raise $100,000, but according to most recent calculations their total stands at $3,715. "The important thing is the money, but the hard thing is biking," says Zelunka, calling on a cellphone from their makeshift campsite, on a baseball diamond in Lake Chaplin, Sask.

Although all four are enthusiastic about cycling, only Zelunka has long-distance biking experience. The learning curve is steep, and the sheer size of the country can be daunting.

"You start to count every kilometre obsessively," says Richards. The group has set a goal of 100 kilometres a day, and has calculated that it should take about 90 days to cover Canada from coast to coast. They stop when they get a chance, to talk to locals and hand out flyers and cards about Robbin's Ride.

They travel in a caravan, with packs on their backs and trailers strapped to their bikes. Meals are peanut butter sandwiches or pasta with tuna fish. Vitamins, painkillers and winter woolies keep them going.

"Our legs are getting bigger and the pains aren't as bad," says Richards.

On the road, the wind is their enemy. They keep their eyes out for wild animals: black bears in the Rockies, and prairie dogs on the plains. At night, they camp in open fields, campgrounds, and along the side of the highway, but sometimes people open their homes and offer them warm beds to stay in. The CN trains always clack in the background. "We never really escape the trains," says Richards.

Richards came up with the idea in December. When he first approached his mother with the plan, she had an "emotional meltdown."

"I know my son has a deep emotional commitment to this, but I'm deeply impressed by the other boys," she says.

"They are all university students and they could all go out to make money for their final year of university. Instead, they chose to do this. I am so impressed."

Robbin Richards was diagnosed with breast cancer in 1992. "All my children have lived with this all their lives," she says. She recently completed another round of chemotherapy and will undergo more testing in July.

Breast cancer is the most common cancer among Canadian women. One in nine women is expected to develop it in her lifetime. This year, about 21,600 women will be diagnosed with breast cancer, and 5,300 will die of it.

All money raised will go towards Sunnybrook and Women's hospital's campaign to build a new wing for breast cancer treatment. Donations to Robbin's Ride can be made online at www.robbinsride.ca.

U of Ottawa residence named for Soloway

OTTAWA — The University of Ottawa's newest residence has been named for the late Hyman Soloway. The $15.5 million building, which opened last September, houses 239 students. A member of the university's board of governors from 1990 to 2004 and an active member of Jewish communal organizations, Soloway was a lawyer who was born in Ukraine and educated in Canada. The university's Hyman Soloway Chair in Business and Trade Law is also named for him.

Summer weather tries skin to its limits

Skin is the largest organ in the human body. It serves many purposes, functioning as a barrier between the body and the outside world. It defends the body from harmful environmental elements, such as the weather and solar radiation. It prevents the entry of harmful bacteria and other germs. It helps regulate the body's temperature and helps maintain an appropriate fluid balance. In the summer months, especially in the camping environment, the skin is tried to its limits. Most damage to the skin is a result of inadequate planning and poor decision-making; however, prevention can be achieved by taking a few anticipatory measures.

By Dr. Orli Goldberg

Sunburns and skin cancer

Skin cancer is the most common type of cancer in Canada, according to the Canadian Cancer Society. In fact, there has been a 30 per cent increase in skin cancer in Canada over the past 10 years. Ninety percent of skin cancers can be prevented.

More than a half of a person's lifetime ultraviolet (UV) radiation exposure occurs during childhood and adolescence. This early exposure plays a critical role in the future development of skin cancer. People with a history of more than one blistering sunburn during childhood or adolescence are twice as likely than unexposed individuals to develop melanoma, the most fatal form of skin cancer. Although children should not be discouraged from playing outdoors, it is important to take precautions.

The following are some tips from the Canadian Dermatology Association (CDA) to help stay safe in the sun:

- The first and best line of defence against the sun is covering up. Wear a wide-brimmed hat, sunglasses, and light, long-sleeved clothing.
- Stay in the shade whenever possible, and avoid sun exposure during the peak intensity hours – between 11 a.m. and 4 p.m.
- Use a sunscreen with a sun protection factor (SPF) of 30 or greater.
- Apply sunscreen generously 20 minutes before outdoor activity, and reapply sunscreen every two hours, or after swimming or sweating.
- Be on the lookout for moles that change colour or size, bleed, or have irregular borders – all potential signs of skin cancer.

Mosquito bites and West Nile Virus

Mosquito bites can be a nuisance in and of themselves, as they can be extremely itchy and can become infected if scratched. More recently, concern over West Nile Virus (WNV) has made protection against mosquito bites even more important. WNV is a potentially serious illness that can be transmitted by mosquito bites. Experts believe WNV is established as a seasonal epidemic in North America that flares up in the summer and continues into the fall.

WNV affects the central nervous system, and symptoms vary from person to person. According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), approximately 80 per cent of people who are infected with WNV will not show any symptoms at all. Up to 20 per cent of the people who become infected will display milder symptoms, which can include fever, headache, and body aches, nausea, vomiting, swollen lymph glands or a skin rash on the chest, stomach and back.

Only about 1 in 150 people infected with WNV will develop severe illness, the majority being elderly or having a weakened immune system. The severe symptoms can include high fever, headache, neck stiffness, disorientation, coma, convulsions, muscle weakness, vision loss, numbness and paralysis. These symptoms may last several weeks, and neurological effects may be permanent.

The best way to avoid WNV is to prevent mosquito bites. The following are some tips from the CDC:

- When outdoors, use insect repellents containing DEET (N, N-diethyl-meta-toluamide). The concentration of DEET in products may range from less than 10 per cent to over 30 per cent. The benefits of DEET reach a peak at a concentration of 30 per cent, the maximum concentration currently recommended for children.
- Many mosquitoes are most active at dusk and dawn. Be sure to use insect repellent and wear long sleeves and pants at these times or consider staying indoors during these hours.
- Avoid areas where insects nest or congregate, such as stagnant pools of water, uncovered foods, and gardens where flowers are in bloom.

Poison Ivy, Oak, or Sumac

Rashes from poison ivy, oak, or sumac are all caused by urushiol, a substance found in the sap of the plants. Rashes can be prevented by learning to identify these plants and avoiding them. A useful rule in recognizing poison ivy and oak is, "Leaves of three, beware of me," as these plants have three leaves per cluster (poison sumac has 7 to 13 leaves per branch). The rash is not contagious from person to person, but can be spread by urushiol remaining on clothes or objects.

If you do come in contact with these plants, take the following precautions:

- Wash skin with cool water to prevent the spread of urushiol.
- Take an oatmeal bath or apply calamine lotion to relieve itching.
- Do not pop blisters, as this can lead to infection and scarring of the skin.

By taking these precautions, you and your skin will enjoy a safe summer. If you have further questions regarding these topics, please consult your physician.

New revelations in AIPAC case

By RON KAMPEAS and MATTHEW E. BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Two former staffers at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee facing indictment on espionage charges shared allegedly classified information at the crux of the case against them with AIPAC's executive director as soon as they received it, JTA has learned.

Howard Kohr had no idea that the information in the July 21, 2004 e-mail from Keith Weissman, then AIPAC's Iran analyst, was classified, multiple sources said, and the government has told AIPAC that Kohr is not the subject of any investigation. Kohr did not further disseminate the information, sources familiar with the events said.

A spokesperson for AIPAC categorically denied any wrongdoing.

"No current employee of AIPAC knew that classified information was obtained from Larry Franklin," the Pentagon analyst who allegedly gave Weissman the information, "or was involved in the dissemination of such information," spokesperson Patrick Dorton said. "AIPAC does not seek, use or request anything but legal and appropriate information as part of its work."

Weissman and Steve Rosen, AIPAC's former policy director, could be indicted this month or next for allegedly passing information to an Israeli Embassy official, Naor Gilon, the chief political officer. AIPAC fired Weissman and Rosen in March because of information it says arose out of the investigation.

The government is considering a public arrest of Rosen, sources say, a signal of the tough posture it plans to take on the case. Such hardball tactics – which included two public raids of AIPAC offices – have prompted new criticism and questions from Jewish leaders.

Some fear that the case will inhibit the functioning of Jewish organizations and others that deal with the executive branch.

"Not just Jewish organizations, but lobbyists in general," said Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League. "Lawyers will be telling their clients, 'Let's look at practices.' "

The revelation of the e-mail to Kohr raises questions about the intentions of Rosen and Weissman in obtaining and sharing the allegedly classified information. The FBI knows about the e-mail, sources told JTA, and its existence apparently was the subject of much scrutiny by a grand jury convened in January to consider the case.

The apparent rush by Weissman and Rosen to tell their boss the new information could reinforce the defence contention that they were not lone wolves bent on espionage – as sources close to the defence believe the government plans to argue – but lobbyists sharing inside information, as was their job. That is to be the crux of the two men's defence, sources said.

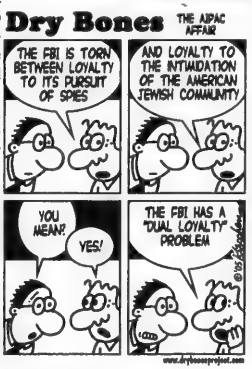
The revelation of the e-mail to Kohr also raises the question of why AIPAC fired Rosen and Weissman after months of defending their integrity. Some AIPAC donors and Jewish community leaders have asked whether it was appropriate for the organization to fire the two if the acts at the centre of the investigation were part of their daily routine as lobbyists.

However, a source close to AIPAC suggested that what the men did was far from routine.

"Rosen and Weissman were dismissed because they engaged in conduct that was not part of their job and was beneath the standards of what AIPAC expects of their employees," the source said.

Franklin, the Pentagon Iran analyst who allegedly told Weissman that Israeli agents supposedly in northern Iraq faced grave danger, pled not guilty June 13 to relaying classified information to Rosen, Weissman and Gilon at on earlier occasions.

Sources close to the defence say the U.S. attorney's office in northern Virginia plans an aggressive prosecution, especially of Rosen. Prosecutors have indicated they want Rosen arrested and "perp walked" – led into the courthouse in handcuffs – for the cameras, the sources say, and may object to bail.



Dry Bones
THE AIPAC AFFAIR
THE FBI IS TORN BETWEEN LOYALTY TO ITS PURSUIT OF SPIES
AND LOYALTY TO THE INTIMIDATION OF THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMUNITY
YOU MEAN?
YES!
THE FBI HAS A "DUAL LOYALTY" PROBLEM

Prosecutors let Franklin turn himself in, and they intend to make the same allowance for Weissman, the sources said.

A spokesperson for U.S. Attorney Paul McNulty would not comment, nor would lawyers for Rosen, Weissman or Franklin.

The notion that Iranian agents planned to kidnap, torture and kill Israelis and American agents in northern Iraq allegedly was fed to Weissman on July 21, 2004, by Franklin as part of an apparent FBI sting of Rosen and Weissman.

The crux of the government's case, defence sources say, is the conversation Rosen and Weissman allegedly had the same day with Gilon. Prosecutors are likely to say that conversation violated the 1917 Espionage Act, which could be interpreted as banning the relaying of classified information to a foreign power.

Rosen and Weissman will claim that they did not realize at the time that the information was classified, defence sources say.

AIPAC officials say they have been assured by the government that investigators aren't targeting the organization or any current staffer, including Kohr.

Franklin is accused of relaying classified information to Rosen, Weissman and Gilon in 2002 and 2003. By July 21, 2004, he was co-operating with the FBI.

He later suspended that co-operation, which led the FBI to reinstate its case against him. Defence sources say that if indictments against Rosen and Weissman come down, some of their other contacts with Franklin also will be raised, but the July 21 sting is the core of the government's case.

Weissman allegedly called Franklin early on the morning of July 21 after months of no contact between the two men, part of a routine that included cold-calling multiple sources inside government. Franklin allegedly said he had urgent information and asked to meet Weissman outside a department store at the Pentagon City mall in Arlington, Va., a subway stop away from the Pentagon.

Franklin allegedly told Weissman that intelligence agencies were suppressing the Iranian plot to kill the Israelis and Americans, and he asked Weissman to relay it to Elliott Abrams, then an assistant national security adviser at the White House. According to this reasoning, Abrams was likelier to listen to a premier lobbying groups than to a mid-level analyst at the Pentagon.

Franklin also allegedly told Weissman that U.S. intelligence had not shared the information with Israeli officials.

PM voices support for demolition

By GIDON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Monday expressed support for the demolition of settler homes slated for evacuation under the planned pullout from the Gaza Strip settlements of Gush Katif.

Attending a special Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee session on the disengagement, Sharon said in response to a question by Labor Knesset member Ephraim Sneh on whether Israel "could handle the danger in showing the difficult images of the demolition."

MK Sneh argued that by destroying homes, Israel would be shown in a negative light across the world, and would also have to cover the cost of the demolition. "Where is the wisdom?" he asked.

Sharon replied that the Palestinian Authority made a specific request to have the homes demolished since they had extensive plans for the rehabilitation of the Gaza Strip and the construction of highrises in evacuated settlements. The World Bank as well as the Americans have also turned to Israel in a similar request, Sharon said.

The prime minister also reiterated that "there will be no disengagement under fire. I mean by that that there won't be fire during the evacuation." Sharon added that the disengagement plan will be fully implemented on its planned date.

When asked by Yahad MK Ran Cohen for his opinion on recent attempts by Likud party members to hamper the pullout, Sharon said, "Don't be surprised if you hear of more attempts and tricks from different directions. But rest assured, the disengagement will be fully implemented as it's planned."

On the issue of the deployment of Egyptian troops along the Philadelphi route along Gaza's border with Egypt, Sharon said that it was made clear to the Egyptians that it would not entail the reopening of the Israel-Egypt agreement on the demilitarization of the Sinai Peninsula, but only a substitution of untrained forces by trained forces along a 14 km-long area near Rafah.

As for the construction of the Gaza port, Sharon said Israel could not take on itself the responsibility for the welfare of the three million Palestinians living in the Gaza Strip, but that it should allow Palestinians contact with the world.

Sharon also said that 28 illegal outposts in the West Bank will be dismantled after the implementation of the disengagement plan.

Anglicans consider divestment from Israel

By DANIELLA PELED
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A move by the Anglican Church to discuss divestment from Israeli businesses supporting the "occupation of Palestinian territory" is causing grave concern among Britain's Jewish community.

Coming close on the heels of the motion by Britain's Association of University Teachers to sever ties with two Israeli universities – a decision subsequently overturned following an international outcry – the Anglican move has sparked fears of a new push for boycotts of the Jewish state.

Of added concern is that the Anglican move follows last year's decision by the Presbyterian Church (USA) to divest its holdings in Israel, with other denominations considering similar moves.

The proposals are scheduled be raised at this week's Nottingham conference of the Anglican Consultative Council, which represents an estimated 77 million members in 38 Anglican provinces around the world, from South America to Africa to Asia.

The proposals come in the form of a study by the Anglican Peace and Justice Network, a body some Christian and Jewish leaders describe as a radical fringe group, which also will be reporting on issues such as homosexuality and AIDS.

The network will present the findings of a 2004 trip delegates took to the region, during which they were "exposed to the draconian conditions of the continuing occupation under which so many Palestinians live," according to an official statement.

Particularly appalled by the "continuing policies of illegal home demolitions, detentions, checkpoints, identity card systems and the presence of the Israeli military that make any kind of normal life impossible," the network concluded there was "little will on behalf of the Israeli government to recognize the rights of the Palestinians to a sovereign state to be created in the West Bank."

"We are fearful that the Christian presence in the Holy Land is dwindling," adds a source within the Anglican Church. "Our constituency are the Palestinian Christians. They are losing ground every day, they can't go to work, can't go to church. So the well-off and educated are leaving Palestine and the community is drying up."

British Jewry, which long has enjoyed close relations with the country's Christian community, is preparing to lobby hard against the proposals, with community leaders planning to join with other groups to oppose the Anglican campaign, having learned valuable lessons from the success of their efforts to overturn the university teachers' motion.

A spokesperson for the Orthodox chief rabbi, Jonathan Sacks, confirmed that Rabbi Sacks was "making representations, along with other community organizations," to get the community's point of view across.

Sigmund Sternberg, a co-founder of the Three Faiths Forum, a body promoting dialogue among Jews, Christians and Muslims, said he has also been in talks with Christian leaders on the subject.

"It's not helpful to the peace process at all, and only a minority in the church support this, the same as with the [academic] boycott," Sternberg said.

> 'It's not helpful to the peace process at all, and only a minority in the church support this'

Condemnation also has come from within the church community. Geoffrey Smith, chairman of the Christian Friends of Israel lobby group, wrote to Rowan Williams, archbishop of Canterbury, the highest-ranking officer in the Church of England, to express his concerns about "a very one-sided report."

Rowan's predecessor, Lord Carey, strongly criticized the concept of sanctions.

"Israelis are already traumatized and feel that the world is against them," he said at the launch of a new human-rights initiative earlier this month. "This proposal, if it is agreed, would be another knife in the back. Christians who owe so much to the Hebrew Scriptures and to Israel itself should not be among those who attack Israel in such a way."

"The Anglican community takes very seriously its commitment to interfaith relations, and this is particularly true now when there is so much turmoil and trouble in the world," Anglican Communion spokesperson Jim Rosenthal said in response to communal criticism. "The church consistently calls for dialogue in the world and we hope this dialogue will be a force for healing and reconciliation."

The network will present its findings at the main council meeting, after which a number of outcomes are possible. The council may formally receive the report but take no action, or it could call for a specific resolution, appoint study groups or send a church delegation to further research the situation.

Those lobbying against the divestment report have an encouraging precedent. Last month, the Church of England's ethical investment advisory group rejected calls from pro-Palestinian activists to withdraw nearly $365,000 worth of shares in the Caterpillar group, which manufactures armored bulldozers the Israeli army uses to demolish the homes of suspected terrorists and uncover arms-smuggling tunnels.

The Nottingham conference "is of concern," says Jason Pearlman, spokesperson for the Board of Deputies, the representative body of British Jewry. "But we have gained assurances from some sections of the church that they will not divest."

Still, as Smith of the Christian Friends of Israel points out, the consultative council will be dominated by foreign delegates, including Riah Abu-Assal, bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of Jerusalem, who is expected to press forcefully for divestment.

"Out of 80 people at the conference, only eight are from Britain," Smith said. "The majority are from overseas, where we have very little leverage."

Pro-Israel campaigners can't afford to be complacent, and they are all too aware of the 2004 decision taken by the three-million member Presbyterian Church (USA), which has assets of some $7 billion (US), to begin divesting from companies that contribute to the Israeli presence in the West Bank and Gaza. Similar moves are being discussed by the United Church of Christ and the United Methodist Church.

The 2.3-million member Episcopal Church, which is part of the Anglican Communion and has an investment portfolio of some $3.6 billion (US), is also considering whether to withdraw funds from Israel.

Sharon promotes pullout

Israel's planned withdrawal from Gaza and northern West Bank will further Zionism, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said. "Leaving Gaza is the future of Zionism," Sharon told a conference on fostering development in the Galilee and other underpopulated areas of Israel. "The disengagement plan does not just entail withdrawing from Gaza; but also strengthening settlement in the Galilee, Negev and greater Jerusalem."

Rabbis rule on Gaza graves

In a letter to the Prime Minister's Office, Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yona Metzger and Sephardi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Amar said that removing 48 bodies from the Gush Katif cemetery is permissible once no Jews remain in Gaza, as leaving them would invite vandalism of the graves. Rabbi Amar said the Mount of Olives cemetery, the most sacred Jewish cemetery in Jerusalem, is the appropriate place for the bodies to be reinterred.

Neo-Nazis out of Israel?

A Knesset committee is seeking legal backing to deport Russian-speaking neo-Nazis living in Israel. The immigration and absorption committee met to address reports of neo-Nazi activity among small groups of non-Jewish immigrants, the Jerusalem Post reported. Israeli police are looking into two such immigrants, nabbed conducting neo-Nazi rituals while serving in the Israeli Army. One witness told the committee that such activity, which one legislator called "isolated and marginal" was not limited to young people, and that some adults in Israel run neo-Nazi websites, the Post reported.

Israel, France mend fences?

Jacques Chirac invited Ariel Sharon to visit France. The French president went public with a June 7 letter he wrote to the Israeli prime minister, in which Chirac wrote, "Our bilateral relations over the last three years have taken on a new lease of life as evidenced by the number of high-level visits... I would like to strengthen this partnership." Israeli political sources said Sharon accepted the invitation and proposed three possible dates for the visit. Israeli-French relations have been rocky in light of Paris' perceived pro-Palestinian tilt and mounting anti-Semitism in France, but Chirac has joined an international chorus in praise of Israel's plan to quit the Gaza Strip this summer.

Ukraine will help Israel with its communication satellite program. The former Soviet republic will participate in the AMOS satellite program, which aims to launch the AMOS-3 satellite in 2007.

More rockets fall on Sderot

Palestinians in Gaza fired rockets into the Negev town of Sderot last week. There were no casualties. Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility.

Israeli named to UN post

Dan Gillerman, Israel's UN envoy, was named a vice-president of the UN General Assembly. The appointment marked the first time in 50 years an Israeli envoy has filled the post, which is largely ceremonial but still wields influence on the UN agenda. His candidacy was submitted by the Western Europe and Others Group, which includes Israel, and went unopposed by Arab states and Iran.

Would-be bombers nabbed

Security forces cracked a Palestinian terrorist cell that recruited four teenagers for suicide bombings. Lifting a gag order on the case, the Shin Bet security service said four minors from the West Bank city of Nablus were arrested on suspicion of planning to carry out attacks. Also arrested were four terrorists from the Palestinians' ruling Fatah Party who recruited them. The cell is believed to have received instruction and funds from the Lebanese terror group Hezbollah. Israeli forces have foiled several attacks by minors from Nablus.

Paris square named for Dreyfus defender

By BRETT KLINE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — A small square in Paris has been named in honour of Bernard Lazare, the radical turn-of-the-century French Jewish journalist and thinker who was among the first to defend Capt. Alfred Dreyfus.

Chief speakers at the June 15 dedication ceremony just south of Place de la République were Paris Mayor Bertrand Delano and Pierre Eidenbaum, mayor of the city's third district. About 200 people attended.

Lazare was born in 1865 in the southern city of Nimes into a well-established, assimilated Jewish family. A writer and literary critic, his first book, Anti-Semitism, Its Causes and History, published in 1894, was heavily critical of Jewish capitalists in Europe and called for total assimilation of the Jews.

The militant anarchist was the first journalist or intellectual in France to defend Dreyfus, a Jewish captain in the French army who was accused of spying for the enemy Germans. Others, such as Emile Zola, who wrote the famous article J'Accuse, followed.

Bernard Lazare

Beginning in 1894, the Dreyfus trial set off major anti-Jewish demonstrations and is considered one of the worst anti-Semitic incidents in French history. It led Lazare to become involved in the defence of oppressed Jews everywhere and to drop his assimilationist stand.

The trial was covered by a journalist from Vienna named Theodor Herzl, who deduced from it that anti-Semitism would never disappear from Europe. The trial was instrumental in helping Herzl formulate his vision of political Zionism.

Dreyfus was found guilty and spent several years on Devils Island, the French penal colony off the coast of South America. The verdict eventually was overturned, but Dreyfus returned to France a broken man.

Lazare was involved in the earliest stages of Zionism, but he never broke with his anarchist and class-struggle beliefs, and subsequently separated from the Zionists.

"I have great admiration for Bernard Lazare," said Jean-Louis Levy, Dreyfus' grandson, who attended the ceremony. "He was the first public figure to defend my grandfather. We never spoke about the affair at home, but we admired Lazare. He was a complex man and a defender of righteous causes."

Jean Michel Rosenfeld, vice-president of the Cercle Bernard Lazare, a left-leaning secular Jewish group in Paris with links to the Yahad party in Israel, said the ceremony was very powerful.

"Until now, Bernard Lazare has only existed in French history books and in our group. Now he will exist in daily Parisian life," said Rosenfeld, who is also an assistant mayor of Paris's 20th district. The plaque is at the exit of a Metro stop, "and hundreds of people pass by every day."

In addition to the Dreyfus and Lazare families, descendants of French writer Emile Zola, who was ruined after supporting Dreyfus, also attended the ceremony.

Worn out by his battles, Lazare died in 1903 at age 38. He and Dreyfus are both buried in the Montparnasse Cemetery in Paris.

Reform bloc saps Sharansky Agency bid

By CHARLOTTE HALLE
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In a surprise move, the Reform movement is nominating Ra'anana mayor Zeev Bielski as Jewish Agency chair, dramatically weakening former cabinet minister Natan Sharansky's chances of being elected to the post, which also carries the title of "prime minister of the Jewish People."

On Sunday night, representatives of Arzenu (the Reform movement), the Shinui Party and Hanoar Hatzioni Zionist youth met and concluded that although their decision to nominate Bielski contradicts normal procedures within the Zionist movement by not supporting the standing chair's party, their desire not to be led by Sharansky overrode such concerns.

Sharansky, who on Sunday night was elected as World Likud's candidate for the post in what was seen as an anti-disengagement statement, was to compete against Bielski, who has been nominated by the prime minister and is also a Likud member, at yesterday's meeting of the Zionist General Council to appoint a new chair. The post is held concurrently with the position of chair of the Jewish Agency.

Without being nominated by a specific faction within the Zionist General Council, Bielski had little chance of being elected to the Agency's top job, despite being widely supported and endorsed by the all-important advise and consent committee within the Jewish Agency.

"Over the years, [Sharansky] has never indicated any understanding of the fact that the majority of world Jewry is not Orthodox," Paula Edelstein, the Reform movement's representative on the WZO executive, said.

"It made no sense for the head of the Jewish Agency to have views at total variance with those of the prime minister," said Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union for Reform Judaism, the congregational arm of the Reform Jewish movement in North America.

2,000-year-old seeds come to life

In the event that the palm may reveal medicinal qualities that have disappeared from modern cultivated varieties, the researchers have sent one of its leaves for DNA analysis.

Date palms now grown in Israel were imported from California and are of a strain originating in Iraq, she said. The Judean date, prized in antiquity but extinct until Methusaleh's awakening, might have had very different properties to the modern variant.

Sallon said she and her colleagues hope the palm may hold promise for the future, such as the anti-malarial treatment, artemisinin, which was developed in China from plants, and a cancer medicine made from the bark of the Pacific yew tree.

"Dates were highly medicinal. They had an enormous amount of use in ancient times for infections, for tumours," she said. "We think that ancient medicines of the past can be the medicines of the future."

If the plant survives, it will take some 30 years to bear fruit, provided it turns out to be female. Sallon, however, said that even a male would provide food for thought.

"The genetics of this plant will be very interesting whatever sex it is," she said. "It's the females that produce the fruit… but the males are very valuable as well. They're no less valuable than the females."

An oral history of a Jewish family in Germany

A Jewish Family in Germany Today: An Intimate Portrait* by Y. Michal Bodemann, Duke University Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Meet the Kalman family.

The Kalmans, a clan of Polish Jews whose children live primarily in Germany and Israel, are the subject of Y. Michal Bodemann's oral history.

In A Jewish Family in Germany Today: An Intimate Portrait (Duke University Press), he relates the story of four Holocaust survivors – the brothers Albert, Ignaz and Jurek and their sister, Gertrud – from the town of Slawkusz who found themselves in Germany after World War II.

Despite their intention to leave the country, they stayed on.

The Kalmans were not that unusual.

In the wake of World War II, some 20,000 Jewish survivors, mainly from Poland and Romania, remained in Germany, the "land of the murderers," as Bodemann, a University of Toronto sociologist, observes.

Like many Jews in their position, the Kalmans – the scions of tradespeople, butchers and store owners – sat on their proverbial suitcases, fully expecting to emigrate. But circumstances dictated otherwise.

Bodemann, a scholar whose specialty is Germany's postwar Jewish community, spent 15 years talking to the Kalmans. For the purposes of this volume, he changed their surname so that they could speak freely.

And in this timely book, which generally encapsulates the attitudes of many Jews living in Germany in the 21st century, they touch on a myriad of topics, from their Jewish identity to their thoughts on Israel.

Bodemann's account focuses primarily on the Kalman children, who were born between 1948 and 1964. But the spirit of their parents, especially Albert, infuses A Jewish Family in Germany Today.

To this reviewer, the most interesting members of the family are two of Albert's sons, Berthold and Ronnie, and Albert's and Jurek's daughters, Esther and Dina. By comparison, Jurek, Ignaz and Gertrud come off as ciphers.

The Kalman brothers were entrepreneurial to the core. Like a lot of others liberated after the war, they traded in goods. But soon their commercial ventures evolved into a major kitchen appliances retail chain, borne along by western Germany's economic boom.

Bodemann describes them as "sojourners" whose two basic goals were to earn as much money as possible, in the shortest period of time, and to nurture their respective families.

They succeeded on both counts, but as a family, they squabbled bitterly. Their conflicts brought about the downfall of a once lucrative business.

The dominant Kalman was Albert, the eldest of the four surviving siblings. According to Berthold, one of his sons, the family firm grew by leaps and bounds. At one point, they had 70 shops nation-wide, with about 750 employees.

Albert, who died in 1985, was a fervent Zionist, but like many Zionists, he never really considered aliyah as an option. However, as his widow, Eva, notes, he did not want to be buried in Germany.

Being extremely ambivalent about his relationship with Germany, Albert did not allow himself or his children to maintain social contacts with Germans over and above a certain limit.

As Berthold, a management consultant, puts it, "He drew boundaries…"

The most important things in Albert's life, apart from his thriving business, were his wife and children.

"He was a pure family person," Berthold comments.

Like his father, Berthold is torn by living in Germany. Due to the past, he does not feel German, but in his professional environment, he feels completely accepted and established.

Albert's other son, Ronnie, a dermatologist, is quite different.

Revolting against his father's injunction, he has German friends and gets along with them really well.

Conversely, he has few Jewish friends. "I don't hang out with other Jews," he explains. "I know a few people here and there… but they are not people whom I would phone." Nor is he particularly interested in Jewish matters.

Albert's additional children, Salek and Esther, reside in Israel.

A bodybuilder who operates a fitness studio in Tel Aviv, Salek is married to an Israeli who lived in Munich.

Esther has been in Israel since 1973 and runs an art gallery in Jerusalem that her father-in-law, a Romanian immigrant, founded. Her recollections of a childhood in Germany sound circumscribed. "I was not allowed to date non-Jews, and basically, I could not have any non-Jewish friends."

As a result, she felt ill at ease in Germany. "All I can say is that I did not feel comfortable with the Germans. There simply was a barrier there."

Esther, who Bodemann refers to as "the Zionist pioneer," is very bitter at having been raised in Germany.

"I always told my father, 'I don't understand how you could stay on in Germany.'"

Albert's attachment to Israel obviously rubbed off on Esther. "Long before my first visit to Israel, I had decided that I wanted to live in Israel," she recalls. "The idea of a Jewish state was important to me, especially with the Six Day War. I remember that well… I was in school, we were incredibly emotional then, and very proud of course."

Dina, Jurek's divorced and remarried daughter who gave Bodemann access to and sharpened his interest in the Kalmans, lived in Israel for a while.

"I really was hell-bent on integrating into Israeli society," she says.. "I felt comfortable among the Israelis, because it was not important there who I was and where I came from… In some ways, I was more Israeli than the Israelis themselves. Often, I was told, 'Are you crazy? Why did you come to Israel, you've got it so comfortable in Germany.' When I told them, because I am a Zionist, they laughed at me. For these people, I was an oddity."

Eventually, Dina returned to Germany, and in the mid-1990s, she met Johannes Rautenstrauch, the man who would be her second husband and the father of their son, who was born in 1998. Although he supports Dina's interest in Judaism, he does not consider himself "a Jewish father."

He is more far interested in Israel, which he has visited and where he feels comfortable. He has no urge to convert to Judaism, and Dina seems content with the status quo.

These and other stories comprise the essence of A Jewish Family in Germany Today, a book that offers insights into a most unusual Jewish community.

Department of Oxymorons: Eye On Arts deplores the insensitivity of the activist group ATSA, an acronym that stands for "Action Terroriste Socialement Acceptable" or "Socially Acceptable Terrorist Action."

Last week ATSA and the Theatre Centre were scheduled to stage several "hyper-realistic" explosions of sports utility vehicles in Toronto's Yonge-Dundas Square. ATSA has already engineered eight similar demonstrations in Montreal and Quebec City and plans more this week in Ottawa. The group's purpose is to "heighten the public's awareness of the perverse effects of gas-guzzling, power-hungry vehicles."

Regrettably, ATSA's mock terrorism only serves to invoke images of real devastation of terrorist atrocities in Israel and elsewhere. While its ecological intent seems worthwhile, the group's name is an oxymoron and its use of the terrorist model is troubling and offensive.

Moscow-born singer 'Jewish ambassador of culture and music'

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

For most musicians, getting a few nasty letters goes with the territory, but the letters that one Russian performer received went well beyond the normal celebrity/fan correspondence.

"I came to receive hate letters, dangerous letters that said, "Go away to Israel, get out of this country, this country's not for Jews," says Svetlana Portnyansky, a Moscow-born singer, who, with Israeli tenor Yevgeni Shapovalov, is playing the Toronto Centre For The Arts on June 26.

The reason for the vile letters was not just because Portnyansky was Jewish – it had as much to do with when she started her career as her religious beliefs.

"[When I started] it was just the beginning of Russia's revival of Jewish culture. I was part of the first wave. It was very moving for all Jews because we didn't hear songs and music for years."

When Portnyansky says years, she's not talking about a few, she's referring to decades.

"Stalin assassinated the Jewish actor and musician Solomon Mikhoels in 1948," she says. "Since then, and until 1988, the Jewish theatre was closed."

It was around the time that Jewish theatres started to open again that Portnyansky's career took off. But as the hate mail suggests, her first few years were trying.

"In the very beginning of the revival, it was a struggle between old times and new times," she says in her thick Russian accent. "The new times had open doors and windows, but the old times hated Jews and they tried to close doors and not let us do what we wanted to do. It was a very dark time."

Although Portnyansky found work all across Russia, she knew that she would eventually need to leave her country.

"We didn't see any future ahead of us. I didn't know what to do and what will be, so when I received an invitation to the States I decided to stay there forever."

Portnyansky's invitation to the United States brought her to New York, and she soon moved to Los Angeles. It wasn't until 1997, six years after she left Russia, that she returned to her homeland.

She noticed that a lot had changed since she'd left Moscow, especially the attitude toward Jews.

"It's a different country. I look at my hometown and I can't recognize it," she says. "I see people have stopped hating Jews, they've opened a lot of Jewish schools, Hebrew facilities, synagogues, and there are a lot of Jewish events." However, she can't shake some of the uncomfortable feelings that still linger.

"It's still remaining Russia, culturally, ideologically. I still find it strange. In my eyes, I look at it like a tourist."

Since moving to the U.S., Portnyansky's career has blossomed. She's travelled across the world, and played shows with famous artists such as Debbie Friedman and Lionel Hampton and released four albums.

While her musical day job technically began after she graduated from the Moscow conservatory, Portnyansky's first voice lesson was from her father.

"When I was a little kid, my father played piano professionally," she says. "He was a very good piano player and I used to hear music, especially classical music since my early childhood. He sang, too, and we sang together. I soon started to repeat everything I heard and then I understood that I liked it. In high school, I decided to be a singer."

Despite all the resistance toward Jewish musicians in Russia, Portnyansky's desire to perform Jewish music never wavered.

Ukrainian immigrant founds travel magazine

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Susanna Kislenko's story may well be the stuff legends are made of.

She was a Ukrainian Jewish immigrant who left the repressive grip of the Soviet regime in the late 1980s and arrived in Canada as a child, unable to speak a word of English.

Today, she is an accomplished writer, travel magazine editor-in-chief and a graduate of studies in international business. The 24-year-old is indeed living proof of Canada as the land where immigrants realize their dreams.

The new magazine under her stewardship is called Legends, and the name has a double meaning.

"Our table of contents is labelled like a legend on the map and… in every issue we will feature the legend behind a certain place, like in the current issue, which is about the legend of the Acropolis," said the York University graduate.

Kislenko's personal legend began in the Soviet Union, where life for Jews was challenging. As a result, the family, like thousands of others, sought to leave.

Their original plan was to resettle in Australia, where they had relatives, but because immigration was a lengthy, step-by-step process, they had to live in limbo in Europe before setting off to their final destination.

"The first place we ended up was Vienna, Austria, where we stayed for two months, waiting for permission to go to Italy," she recalls.

"Then we went to Italy for eight or nine months."

The Australian goal didn't materialize and it turned out that Canada opened its doors.

"We could have stayed in Italy another couple of years [but] Canada accepted us first," she said.

At the age of seven, Kislenko arrived in Toronto. Initially, she hid her heritage in an effort to try and fit in with her classmates.

"You want to fit in and be the same," she said.

"But there came a point where I realized… in a city like Toronto, everybody has their own background."

In time, she became accustomed to her new home, achieved success in school and went on to study international business.

The genesis of the magazine dates back to Kislenko's days writing for the Schulich School of Business' magazine, Insider.

After wrapping up her first year with the publication, Kislenko spent the summer travelling in Australia, where she received an unexpected phone call from Insider's managing editor asking her for story ideas. Naturally, being on a trip halfway around the world, she suggested a travel column, which was titled Travel Tales.

"I put the word out saying if you have a travel story, let us know… and it just took off," she recalled.

"That's when I first got a taste of the kind of demand there was for this demographic."

Kislenko went on to become managing editor of Insider, which she said provided invaluable training. "It was the best experience," she said.

"If I hadn't gotten that experience, I wouldn't have had the confidence and knowledge to gather the content for Legends."

Five thousand copies of Legends' first issue were distributed free across Toronto on April 27.

The travel magazine's core market are 20-something, urban young professionals, a demographic Kislenko believes has been ignored by other travel publications.

"There wasn't anything out there for our demographic that was hip and cool and in line with our interests," she said.

"That's how the idea came to me. I wanted the magazine to be in line with travel through your interests."

To that end, Legends explores travel through music, arts and sports.

For instance, the inaugural issue features a first-hand account of Europe from a musician on tour in that continent, a story about the grave sites of famous musicians and an article on the Tour de France, which also explores cool sites to hit in Paris.

"With every article that I consider [publishing] I just think about whether I would want to pick it up and spend time reading it," she said.

Kislenko honed her own travel writing skills working as a travel columnist for community papers and noted some of that experience taught her what not to do with Legends.

"As a travel columnist, I was once writing for a publication where they didn't care if I went [to the place being written about]," she said.

"That's what I want to avoid. With Legends, all writers have to have been there."

While it's still new, readers and writers alike have caught the magazine's travel bug, with interest in the publication from across the country. She hopes the fire will continue to burn and intends on increasing the size of the magazine from 28 pages to 40.

She is also aiming to have Legends distributed as an insert in city magazines such as NOW and to eventually set up a version of the magazine in Vancouver. As well, Kislenko hopes to provide Legends' readers with interactive travel advice online, including a forum of answers to questions such as, "I'm in Amsterdam and I'm looking for a place just like Toronto's 7 West Café. Does anyone have advice?"

As if the magazine doesn't occupy enough of her time, Kislenko also works full-time at a company that evaluates the credentials of people who earned their degrees outside of Canada. She is also set on becoming a yoga instructor.

Play explores post-9/11 themes

By JONATHAN ROTHMAN
Special to The CJN

SAN FRANCISCO — David Gow identifies with prison. He doesn't practise criminal law or hold a record of convictions. The Montreal writer hasn't been interrogated or detained at the border post-9/11 either, but he's enjoying success with these themes.

"Captivity turns up in my work again and again, different forms of captivity. People in states of psychic terror, psychic duress of one form or another … somehow that's laid next to the humour coming out of that situation," says Gow.

Gow's play Cherry Docs takes place in Toronto, where a Jewish attorney defends a skinhead who kicked a Pakistani man to death.

San Francisco's A Traveling Jewish Theater recently produced the show's successful west coast premiere. Since its initial run at Toronto's Factory Theatre in 1998, the SF production joins past versions from Poland, Germany, Israel, and across the United States and Canada.

It has since been adapted into a film, Steel Toes.

Gow has recently worked on a CBC- Radio play Relative Good, a satire on post-911 border security.

Much of Gow's writing is both political and personal. "It's the human condition, or the human experience; race, politics… is part of that. In Cherry Docs and Relative Good, the personal and political collide in a pretty pronounced way, which creates drama an audience can readily access," Gow says.

"Relative Good is a reflection on something happening now in Canada and the west – arrest and detention without formal charges [has become easier]. These changes in law are portrayed as a reaction to 9/11, and they are, but regardless of where it's coming from, it's a sharp change in the sociopolitical landscape. The play is exploring that change, probably the largest we've seen in the last 50 years, if not several hundred."

In Cherry Docs, Jewish lawyer Danny demands his neo-Nazi client Mike construct his own defense strategy.

Gow recalls a series of events that began in 1999, after the play's first run, which led to a touring production in Hebrew by Tel Aviv-based Nefesh Theater.

"At that time in Israel, there were banners reading 'peace at last.' The mood was that things would be settled, that it was possible. At a time like that, people watching the play could identify even more with the struggle of identity between the two characters."

Gow says he doesn't consciously write about Jewish characters.

"In my first play, years ago, I hadn't made a conscious decision to write a Jewish character. My friend made a suggestion about 'that Jewish character,' and I didn't know what he was talking about. There was nothing to indicate the character was Jewish at all. My friend said, 'he just sounds Jewish.' What I've tried to do with characters I've created is to be true to who they are."

Steel Toes, the film adaptation Gow wrote and directed, brings Danny and Mike onscreen; American actor David Strathairn reprises his role as Danny from the Philadephia production of Cherry Docs.

Gow shot Steel Toes in and around Montreal, and says the film "gets the audience close to the performers… [it] gives a more intimate look at the material." So what else changed?

"I tried to preserve what works best; keep the essence and get that to live on screen. I always say theatre is an aural and an oral form. Film is obviously much more visual. Not every playwright gets to record their own vision."

In the end, though, Gow's tough questions remain: "How do you deal with someone who wants you dead or says they want you dead? Even if they don't recognize you – you don't walk around with tzitzit and payes – they want you dead. How do you deal with that? Cherry Docs became a personal exploration of that question."

Steel Toes is forthcoming from Galafilm later this year. Relative Good airs June 20 at 9:05 p.m. (9:35 Newfoundland) on CBC Radio Two's "Monday Night Playhouse"; the stage version, presented by Ottawa's Great Canadian Theatre Company, premieres this September.

17th MACCABIAH GAMES WILL BE BIGGEST EVER

Set to run from July 10 to 21, the 17th Maccabiah Games promise to be the biggest sports event ever held in Israel.

The opening ceremonies are shaping up to be an extravaganza of olympian proportions involving a torch relay from the tombs of the ancient Maccabean leaders. Some 7,000 athletes and 4,000 dancers, singers, artists and players are slated to join the opening march into the Ramat Gan International stadium in B'nei Brak near Tel Aviv.

Thousands of participants are expected from at least 55 countries, including Canada and the United States. Competitions in swimming, chess, golf, tennis, cricket, softball, rugby and other sports are scheduled for facilities in Caesaria, Jerusalem, Haifa, Ashdod, Petach Tikvah, Herzliyah and other cities.

After the last race has been run, the Games will close with a big-screen stage extravaganza in which celebrity performers and a large troupe of dancers will kick up a fond farewell against the floodlit backdrop of Jerusalem's Old City walls.

Often described as the "Jewish Olympics," the Maccabiah Games are held in Israel every four years. Planned for display during the current Games, a set of memorabilia exhibits will recall the first and second Maccabiahs of 1932 and 1935. For more details, please visit the website www.maccabiah17.com.

Jerusalem Still the Favourite: Jerusalem is the most frequent destination of tourists to Israel, according to statistics released this month by Israel's tourism ministry. The figures show that more than 60 per cent of tourists to Israel visited Jerusalem in 2004, with one third of their overnight hotel stays occurring in Jerusalem. The average stay is six nights.

Jerusalem's Western Wall ranks as the country's top attraction, attracting 54 per cent of all tourists. The Jerusalem Post reported June 6 that the tourism upturn was sparking an economic revival for Jerusalem. The next favourite destinations for visitors are Tel Aviv, which drew 49 per cent of tourists in 2004, followed by Haifa (21 per cent) and Eilat (20 per cent).

'I found myself in Jewish music'

"I found myself in Jewish music. This music fits me, the tune, the melody, the sense of music. I took it very closely, it's in my blood."

To develop her repertoire, Portnyansky studied to become a cantor in Los Angeles. It was in these classes that she learned Hebrew, and her current set list incorporates many cantorial tunes.

Portnyansky says that she's not just trying to convert fans to cantorial music – she's hoping to raise awareness of Jewish culture in general.

"The more I travel around the world, the more people know me. There's a sense of me being an international Jewish ambassador of culture and music. It unites people with different languages," she says.

Of course, Jewish culture doesn't only include cantorial music. Portnyansky sings Broadway songs, originals and other Jewish hits. With almost 20 years of experience behind her, she has an extensive oeuvre, so picking what to sing on tour is a challenge.

"When I choose what to sing, I first of all have to like the music, words and arrangements. When I like it in my concert, I'll put it on CD. Sometimes I'll ask advice from my friends, because I have a pretty big repertoire, but I'm trying to make it wider and more interesting."

Don't expect Portnyansky to pick up a guitar and jam to Israeli rock 'n' roll though. There's not enough room for her to improvise.

"I don't find it interesting. I like my own arrangements and I like improvisation. When I can't [change it], I can't do anything interesting."

Canada's top Jewish athletes set for Maccabiah Games

CJN News Services

Canada will send its largest delegation ever – more than 375 athletes, coaches, administrators and medical staff – to the 17th Maccabiah Games set for July 10 to 21 in Israel. .

An expected 7,500 athletes from 60 countries will compete in a variety of events at the quadrennial event known also as "the Jewish Olympics." It is believed to be the third largest amateur sports gathering in the world after the Olympics and the Commonwealth Games. And for the first time, there will be Maccabiah delegations from China, Macedonia and Grenada.

Toronto-born Sharon Fichman, one of the top-ranked female tennis players for her age in the world, is among the athletes expected to reach the awards podium. Six-foot-11 Alex Bougaieff, a former national team player who attended Rice University in Houston, will lead the basketball squad. Canada's youngest competitor is 13-year-old sprinter Darrian Tissenbaum.

Irwin Cotler, Canada's federal justice minister, will also attend as a masters athlete in the table tennis competition.

The largest delegation will be from Israel itself and will include Athens Olympic gold medalist windsurfer Gal Friedman, as well as judo bronze medalist Arik Ze'evi and European pole vaulting champion Alex Averbukh. About 35 per cent of the host Israeli team is expected to consist of immigrants from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia.

Russia will bring three fencing medalists from the Athens Olympics, as well as European fencing champion Dimitry Ragin.

Sydney Olympics triple gold medalist swimmer Lenny Krayzelburg will captain the record U.S. delegation of 1,200, which will include Athens swimming double gold medalist Scott Goldblatt.

"This is a special moment to be part of the U.S. delegation and be honorary team captain," said Krayzelburg, who also captained the squad in 2001. "I feel that since the 2001 Games, I have really become attached to the Maccabi movement. To me, the Maccabiah Games represented a life-changing event that affects many people that are part of it and I am proud to be one of them."

Allen Gerskup, head of Canada's delegation, said Canada will participate in 18 sports and will make its debut in women's softball, open men's soccer and junior boys' baseball.

"The Maccabiah Games are about sports, athletes competing against the best in the world and about making a difference," said Gerskup, who noted that Canada's top Jewish athletes were chosen following a series of tryouts. "This could very well be the best contingent in our history."

Maccabiah organizers are hoping a successful event restores the games' somewhat tarnished image.

The 16th Maccabiah was nearly cancelled because of the security situation in the midst of the second intifadah, and although it went ahead, only 2,200 athletes participated from 46 countries, including Canada, as well as 1,000 Israelis.

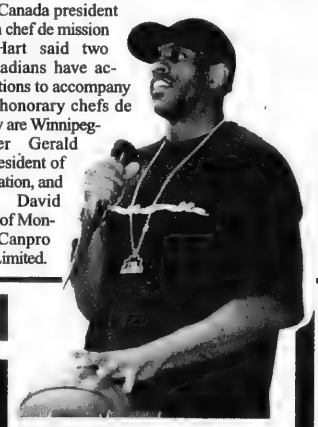
The 15th Maccabiah was marred by a tragedy at the opening ceremonies when a foot bridge collapsed near Ramat Gan National Stadium. Four members of the Australian team died after they plunged into the Yarkon River and dozens were injured, many seriously.

Australia will send a record team of 550 athletes to the 17th games. Britain will send more than 400 participants, while the World Maccabiah Movement will subsidize delegations from Latin America, Eastern Europe and countries of the former Soviet Union.

The first Maccabiah Games were held in 1932, when 390 athletes came from 18 countries. Swimming events were held in the Mediterranean Sea.

Canada competed in the games for the first time in 1951. Our best performance was in 1997, winning team gold medals in softball, basketball and hockey in addition to a number of individual awards.

Maccabi Canada president and Canadian chef de mission Lawrence Hart said two notable Canadians have accepted invitations to accompany the team as honorary chefs de mission. They are Winnipeg-born lawyer Gerald Schwartz, president of Onex Corporation, and developer David Azrieli, head of Montreal-based Canpro Investments Limited.



Sailors earn silver at Euro championship

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israel's sailors took silver medals in both the men's and women's 470 event at the European Championship in Poland last week.

Udi Gal and Nir Klieger won silver medals in the men's event and Vered Buskila and Nika Kornitzki finished second in the women's event.

For both pairs, last week's silver medals removed some of the bitter taste remaining from last summer's Olympic Games in Athens, where they failed to finish in the medals despite high expectations.

"It is an exceptional achievement for Israeli sailing," said Israel Sailing Association chairman Yehuda Ma'ayan. "I'm glad both pairs took medals. Our next goal is gold at the World Championship in San Francisco."

The medals give both pairs a place on the Olympic Committee of Israel's elite squad and a 5,000-shekel-a-month grant for each of the sailors.

We must protect our beautiful lakes

"God led Adam around all the trees of the Garden of Eden. And God said to Adam, 'See my works, how good and praiseworthy they are? And all that I have created I made for you. But be mindful then that you do not spoil and destroy my world, for if you spoil it, there is no one after you to repair it'" (Midrash Kohelet Rabbah 7:13, eighth century CE).

Judaism has a balanced and rational approach to environmental issues that could be a source of pride to Jews and an inspiration to everyone. However, our relationship with nature is fragile, delicate, and needs our immediate attention.

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

On the news recently, the weather reporter listed Toronto area beaches that were safe for swimming. Beaches not on the list – which changes daily due to pollution levels – were considered unsafe and swimming was not permitted.

Water pollution is a change in the chemical, physical and biological health of a waterway due to human activity. Ways that humans have affected the quality of the Great Lakes over the centuries include sewage disposal, toxic contamination with heavy metals and pesticides, over-development of the water's edge, runoff from agriculture and urbanization, and air pollution.

Pollution puts the ecosystem out of balance and causes serious destruction to nature, animals and humans. Water pollution is caused in part by the disposal of waste into a river or lake. In large or small amounts, dumped intentionally or accidentally, it may get carried away by the current, but it doesn't disappear. It reappears downstream, sometimes in changed form or just diluted.

When I lived in the United States in the 1990s and drove by Exxon gas stations, the shocking image of helpless ducks covered in oil invaded my thoughts. On March 24, 1989, the Exxon Valdez oil tanker spilled approximately 11 million gallons of oil – equivalent to 125 Olympic-sized swimming pools – in Prince William Sound off the coast of Alaska. The spill was accidental, but the results of this environmental tragedy were horrific.

The oil spread slowly over open water during three days of flat calm seas. The estimated death toll from the spill was 250,000 seabirds, 2,800 sea otters, 300 harbour seals, 250 bald eagles, up to 22 killer whales, and billions of salmon and herring eggs.

I never filled up my car with Exxon's gasoline.

It's now 2005. The current water pollution statistics for the Great Lakes are devastating. Have we not learned anything from the Exxon Valdez spill?

Canadian Press reported on June 8, that "despite government claims pollution is decreasing, a new study says Canada released a billion kilograms of toxic chemicals annually in the Great Lakes basin from 1998 to 2002, with no significant decline. Most of the chemicals were released into the air – now recognized as the biggest source of pollution affecting the lakes – by industries and public utilities. The load in 2002 included three million kilograms of carcinogens and almost 2,000 kilograms of mercury."

Other sources report that water pollution in the Great Lakes is causing severe damage to the aquatic environment and to our health. Contaminated drinking water has caused sickness and deaths, not to mention that many of our fish are poisoned with chemicals, and sediment at the bottom of the lakes is becoming increasingly toxic.

Our water is being polluted by municipal, agricultural and industrial waste, including many toxic synthetic chemicals that can't be broken down by natural processes. Some factories take large amounts of water from Lake Ontario, and after using it, dump it back into the lake with high levels of mercury. Soaps and cleaners with harsh chemicals also add to the destruction of the most beautiful bodies of water in the world. The Kyoto Protocol, an international treaty designed to decrease global warming by cutting greenhouse gas emissions, might help to change this.

It is our obligation to prevent further damage to our beautiful lakes – because there is no one else to repair them.

"Jews in history"

By JOE KING

Al Gross (1918-2000) invented the walkie-talkie and the pager, and is known as the founding father of wireless communication.

Born in Toronto, he became fascinated with radio while on a steamboat trip on Lake Erie when he was nine years old. A ship's radio operator let him listen to the wireless.

His family moved to Cleveland, Ohio, where, by age 12, Gross had collected equipment from junkyards and built a crystal detector set in his basement. At 16, he obtained amateur radio licence W8PAL, and to many in wireless communications, that is how he was known.

In 1938, using unexplored frequencies above 100 MHz, he invented the "walkie-talkie."

The U.S. Office of Strategic Services (OSS) recruited Gross to design a portable two-way air-to-ground communications system. He developed two – a ground unit called "Joan" and an airborne facility dubbed "Eleanor." During World War II, these units enabled the Allies to communicate with each other using Herzian radio waves, without fear the enemy would be able to monitor their transmissions.

Al Gross

Gross's work resulted in the creation of the Citizens Radio Service Frequency Band, approved by the U.S. Federal Communications Commission (FCC) in 1946. He then formed a company in 1948 that produced two-way radios for personal use. In 1949, he developed the telephone pager, using a pocket-sized wireless receiver.

William E. Kennard, chair of the FCC, formally acknowledged Gross's achievements in 1999, noting that his "contributions included such wireless devices as the walkie-talkie, the cordless telephone and the beeper."

Shortly after this, U.S. president Bill Clinton joined in the tribute to the inventor, then 82, with a letter of commendation.

Journalist John Stanley, in an article in the Arizona Republic on Jan. 7, 2001, wrote: "If you've ever used a cell-phone, pager or garage-door opener, thank Al Gross."

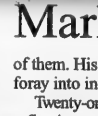
Mark Gryfe: my creative mentor

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER



One of my first glimmers of self-awareness came through a quaint interaction with Mr. Glenn, my Grade 3 science teacher. One ordinary day in 1968, he said to me, "Avrum, you are dishevelled. Do you know what that means?"

"No," I replied.

"Well," he retorted, "dishevelled means to seem or to be unkempt… sort of ruffled."

Mr. Glenn was right. Many times since then, I have discovered an amusing indignity on my feet – one green and one blue sock. My hair is frequently wind-swept, and other than those things that I understand vaguely well, my thoughts can be untidy. I have even coined the term "dishevellism" to describe my art. I am dishevelled; however, I choose to think Mr. Glenn meant that in the same way that a forest grows unfettered.

Few instances stand out in our memories that serve to define us. Mr. Glenn's bold assertion, made in my eighth year of life, was one of them. His words introduced me to me – my foray into introspection.

Twenty-one years later, I experienced another reflective episode – the discovery of my creativity. It was 1990, and I had begun working at the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) as freedom was breaking out in the former Soviet Union (FSU). It was a wildly Jewish time and it would require imaginative artistry to raise an unimaginable amount of money to rescue Soviet Jews.

My boss was Mark Gryfe. He was a thirtyish creative fireball, the youngest UJA campaign director in the world, and his ebullient presence and spontaneous outbursts of inventive ideas regularly filled the office like helium fills a balloon. He was unquestionably right for the task – a genius within his empire who actualized his gift with a childlike demeanour.

April arrived and Mark and his seven chairpersons chose to do the unthinkable: to launch the campaign – Operation Exodus – immediately, four months before the traditional start time. The air was thick with confidence. Every morning, Mark summoned the staff and, like a general decidedly aware of his place in history, reported on daring Jewish rescues in the FSU and the arduous task before us. At 29, I was for the first time on a team led by a dazzling whiz kid of a man who both intimidated me and energized the hell out of me.

By the end of week 1, Mark delegated the co-ordination of the Operation Exodus campaign launch at Pantages Theatre to me. By week 2, he asked me to create The Fifth Question – a community pamphlet on Operation Exodus.

Sheepishly, I offered a creative idea. Mark liked it. I became bolder and decided to design the content of the pamphlet in three languages – English, Hebrew and Russian. Mark evaluated my work, beamed his David Letterman smile, and without warning, shouted an earbending "Yes!"

A month or so into the campaign, Mark asked me if I had a second. With great panache and big-heartedness – like a generous CEO who initiates a conversation in an elevator with a new entry-level employee – my creative mentor handed me a skilfully framed copy of The Fifth Question. A penned note at the bottom of the pamplet read: "Congratulations on an excellent job." Mark had had it signed by Charles Bronfman.

This was the first time somebody had encouraged and celebrated my creativity and it was a turning point in my life. I will forever cherish those captivating moments with Mark. I'm sure many others who have interacted with Mark have also experienced his creative brilliance during his tenures at UJA, Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University and currently as the president of the Baycrest Foundation.

Mr. Glenn compelled me to become introspective. Mark Gryfe enabled me to chase my dreams… two defining moments in my life initiated by two good men.

Tribute to ISRAEL

'Privileged to know them'

Editorial

The people walking on the sandy, white beach behind the young lad carrying the Israeli flag are not Israelis. They are Sri Lankans.

Their makeshift oceanside parade was a spontaneous gesture of gratitude to the people of Israel – the tiny land so far away – who responded within hours to the monstrous tsunami tragedy that struck the island so hard late last December.

Israelis are still in Sri Lanka helping the tsunami victims, some of whom are the same smiling people sloughing their toes through the warm sand in the above photo.

The story of this particular humanitarian relief effort is little told in the rest of the world. Neither are the countless other stories told about the wonders and the benefits that Israeli industry, science, technology, medicine and scholarship bring to the world.

But all Sri Lanka knows.

It is important, however, that we know and speak of it too.

IsraAID, the non-governmental Israeli humanitarian relief agency that dispatches assistance and aid wherever it can, has distributed food in Sri Lanka to more than 12,000 mothers and children through local mother and child health clinics. It has provided Sri Lankan women with sewing machines to help them rebuild their livelihoods and establish small businesses to support their families. It has also built or repaired homes for the needy.

Shachar Zahavi, one of the Israeli founders of IsraAID, last week sent The CJN an e-mail in which he wrote that he believes the Israeli assistance in Sri Lanka has had a "profound effect… on the lives of tens of thousands of people."

He receives "non-stop e-mails from people who encounter the Israeli team on the ground since the December 2004 tsunami disaster in Sri Lanka and hear[s] their praise and delight in working alongside them. Israel's image lies not only on the government but also on its people, and these Israelis deployed to the field are a great example. I feel privileged to know them."

Israel's image in the world, alas, to which Zahavi alludes, has been painted and sculpted for more than three decades in dark colours and distorted shapes. But an image – any image – deliberately cast only darkly and distortedly, can never be true.

Such is the case with the false image of Israel depicted by its enemies and detractors from whom we have heard a great deal since the beginning of Yasser Arafat's war in September 2000 and the World Conference on Racism in Durban, South Africa, a year later.

Despite its flaws and imperfections, however, Israeli society is uniquely inspiring. In two months, it will begin the process of unilaterally dismantling Jewish communities from territory it won in a war that it waged 38 years ago in defence of its life. Yet, in a real sense, it is still fighting for its life some 57 years after its establishment.

Where is the country, anywhere on earth, that would undertake or has undertaken so bold and so painful a measure?

To borrow Zahavi's words, "I feel privileged to know them." Indeed, I feel privileged to live in a world in which Israel lives too.

As Rabbi Moshe Shulman of the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto has written in the Perspectives essay in this issue, we must show our support for the State of Israel and its brave people without distinction or preference for religious, political or any other affiliation.

The most eloquent statement of tribute to Israel by the people of Sri Lanka, Zahavi wrote in his e-mail, "is the Israeli flag hanging in various places in the Galle district in Sri Lanka."

It is that sense of tribute that we show on this page and that we share.

We extend our congratulations to the State of Israel on the occasion of its 57th Anniversary of Independence

Haifa is a model of Jewish-Arab coexistence, mayor says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The mayor of Haifa – Israel's third largest city – was here recently to promote his hillside port city as a unique laboratory of Arab-Jewish co-existence.

"Haifa," claimed Yona Yahav in an interview, "is the only place on earth where there is full peace between Jews and Arabs."

He added, "It's important to make this known because it proves it's possible for Jews and Arabs to live together."

Yahav, here at the invitation of the Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation, held up Haifa as a model of pluralism and harmony in a region torn by ethnic and religious discord.

"They get along very well," said Yahav, speaking of the Jewish majority of 240,000 inhabitants and the Arab minority of 30,000 residents. "It's something normal in Haifa."

Nor has the second Palestinian uprising sullied Haifa's status and image as a tolerant metropolis where Jews and Arabs mingle easily, he observed.

During the earliest phase of the current intifadah in October 2000, Israeli Arabs, in solidarity with their cousins in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, went on a one-day rampage throughout Israel.

Israeli police fired on the Arab demonstrators and rioters, killing 12.

Although the situation was emotionally charged in Haifa, Yahav said, the demonstrators dispersed after a few hours, and since then, calm has prevailed.

In the past four and a half years, Palestinian suicide bombers have killed 85 Jews and Arabs in four separate attacks in Haifa. The attackers targeted restaurants and buses jointly owned and frequented by Arabs and Jews.

"The aim of the bombers was to jeopardize Arab-Jewish relations," said Yahav, a 60-year-old Labor Party politician who has been mayor since June 2003. "But they have not succeeded."

Of all of Israel's ethnically mixed cities, Haifa has the largest concentration of Arabs after Nazareth, whose Arab population is listed as 60,000.

Yahav said Arab-Jewish relations in Haifa are better than in Ramle and Lod, where Jews and Arabs also live virtually side by side.

"Arabs feel wanted in Haifa," said Yahav, a lawyer by profession and a member of the Knesset from 1996 to 1999. "They feel equal, like partners."

Joseph Khoury, an Israeli Christian Arab on Yahav's delegation, cited yet another factor for the positive state of Arab-Jewish ties in Haifa.

"The Christian and Muslim communities are not led by extremists," said Khoury, a 65-year-old Greek Orthodox businessman in the building trade who is active in the Haifa Foundation.

Although Haifa's Jews and Arabs mix freely, they lead largely separate lives, said Yahav, whose deputy is an Arab.

In keeping with previous Ottoman and British Mandate tradition, more than 90 per cent of Arabs reside in their own neighbourhoods and all but a handful of Muslim and Christian students attend public or private Arab schools.

Jews, however, generally enjoy a higher standard of living than Arabs in Haifa. The reason is that most Haifa Arabs are originally from nearby villages and need time to close the gap, Yahav said.

Though the relationship between Arabs and Jews in the rest of Israel is "not bad," there is considerable room for improvement, Khoury noted.

"We're struggling for equality," he said, referring to Israel's one million plus Arab citizens. "Arabs want to live in coexistence, but with their rights. I want to feel I belong. I want to feel it's my state, too."

He urged the Israeli government to take three major steps: to allocate equal municipal funding to Arab towns and villages, to upgrade the standard of the Arab education system and to open up all jobs, in the private and public sector, on the basis of merit.

In the meantime, the Haifa Foundation, which is dedicated to improving the quality of life in the city, is working on two projects to achieve that broad objective.

A co-existence park, with a soccer field and a community centre, is being built where Jews and Arabs can meet on neutral ground.

"Then the walls can fall down," said Dani Neuman, the executive director of the Haifa Foundation.

The first section of the park is scheduled to be opened later this year.

Plans are also afoot to expand an existing Jewish-Arab community centre. A fundraising campaign has been launched, and if all goes according to plan, the enlarged centre will be inaugurated in 2006.

Yahav, who was born in Haifa, called on overseas Jewish travellers to visit his city.

"We feel a bit neglected as far as world Jewry is concerned. Diaspora Jews usually visit Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, but skip Haifa."

The mayor, who was here with his wife Rivka, also visited Hamilton, where he appeared at a reception hosted by two former Israeli Arabs from Nazareth, Joe and Elham Farah, the owners of the Hasty Market chain of stores.

The event was attended by Jews and Arabs and attracted, among others, Israel's consul general in Toronto, Yaacov Brosh, and the mayor of Hamilton, Larry Dilanni.

Solutions for today – Strategies for tomorrow

Tribute to Israel

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's speech at the launch of the Masa Project

It is not every day that a man sees his dream beginning to be realized. Two years ago, I announced at the [United Jewish Communities General Assembly] that I had a dream that every Jew would visit Jerusalem at least once, and that I believe that we must set the goal that every Jewish youngster would live here for at least one year during their lifetime.

Today, we launch the Masa Project. Today, we are taking a giant step towards realizing that dream. Today, we are taking a giant step towards the time when living in Israel for a period of time will be an inseparable part of the life of every Jewish youngster around the world, just as the Land of Israel is an inseparable part of our identities as Jews.

Ariel Sharon

I am a Jew, and for me, being a Jew is the most important thing. I view it as my personal responsibility, as a Jew and as prime minister of the Jewish state, to ensure the future of the Jewish people for the next 30 years, the next 300 years, and, God willing, the next 3,000 years.

The Masa Project is part of the actualization of the State of Israel's commitment to the future of the Jewish people. It is a mission which the government of Israel – every government, today and in the future – must see as one of its most important goals.

We are currently near the ancient city of Maresha, which is mentioned in the Bible as one of the towns of the Judah tribe and as one of the cities which Rehoboam the king fortified. Eight kilometres north, in Emek Ha'Elah, the armies of the Philistines and the armies of Saul, king of Israel, stood face to face. In between them, David, the red-headed boy, shot a rock into Goliath's forehead. Later, David hid from Saul in caves which are in this area. Approximately 1,000 years later, Bar Kochba's warriors hid in the same caves, and from there launched attacks against the Roman armies.

The Philistines and the Romans are ancient history. However, the descendants of King David's warriors established Kibbutz Beit Guvrin here behind you 56 years ago, where there is an advanced factory producing polymers used in various industries. In the area surrounding us, there are vines which produce excellent wines, and wineries which preserve historical biblical names, such as Tzora and Kela David. Located approximately 10 kilometres from here is the Intel factory in Kiryat Gat, where the descendants of Bar Kochba's warriors produce the advanced processors found in millions of computers worldwide. On this land, where the kings and prophets walked, today walk scientists and writers, inventors and industrialists, members of the military and farmers. This is the uniqueness of the Land of Israel – it has a glorious past, a promising present, and together with you, a bright future.

Out of the hundreds of students who are here – such as Rina Goldberg from Canada and Olga Zayetzevah from Belarus, who study at the Hebrew University – will certainly emerge the best scientists and Nobel laureates of the future.

The future leaders of Israel and the Diaspora will emerge from your ranks, such as Robin, who spoke here earlier, and immediately following this event will fly back to the United States to be a counsellor at a Jewish summer camp. From your ranks will emerge the mutual guarantee between all sectors of the Jewish nation, which finds expression in the adoption of the children's house in Netanya by the pupils of the "Shalem" group of Young Judea, and in the work with children suffering from head injuries in Kfar Maccabiah, which the pupils of "World Maccabi" from Latin America undertook. And you, Tal Avneri, who flies every week from Kibbutz Ktora in the Arava to Metullah in order to participate in ice hockey practice, perhaps, thanks to you, Israel, which has already established its standing as a powerhouse in European basketball and judo, will excel in this sport as well.

The possibilities open to you in Israel today are limitless.

I am very pleased that you chose to participate in this journey [Masa]. I am certain that, for most of you, this will be the most important journey of your lives. I hope to see you all here, with us, in the State of Israel.

This is the most important thing we need. If, in the meantime, you choose not to make aliyah – I hope you will decide to make aliyah, but if in the meanwhile you decide not to make aliyah – I hope to see you as activists and community leaders. I believe that the Masa Project will grow and succeed, and I hope to see in the future, tens and hundreds of thousands of young Jews journey to their land – a journey in Israel.

And remember: we need you, all of you. We always did. Today, we need you more than ever. More than ever.

Thank you.

Israel hoping long-term stays by Diaspora youth will pay dividends

By DINA KRAFT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Ben Russell helped deliver two babies, taught English to Druze children, worked with Ethiopian immigrants, led coexistence workshops with Arab students and met Prime Minister Ariel Sharon during his "year off" in Israel before college.

"I always felt like I knew bits of Israel, but not well," said Russell, who grew up in London and will study at Cambridge University in the fall.

"I wanted to spend some real time here and get to know the country."

Russell, 19, is one of some 5,600 young Jews from around the world who came to Israel this year for long-term study or volunteer programs. The sense of connection and adventure that these extended visits create are seen as a safeguard against climbing intermarriage rates and a drop in Jewish community involvement among young people.

> 'Build a next generation of Jewish people into the future'

Israeli officials believe that longer stays in the country are the best way to cement Jewish identity and commitment to Israel – including an interest in aliyah – among the next generation of Jews. They don't merely trust that such programs are the way to go; they're banking on them.

Last month, the Israeli government and the Jewish Agency for Israel launched an ambitious program called Masa, or Israel Journey, in which they plan to invest $100 million (US) a year to help subsidize semester and yearlong programs for Diaspora youth.

Program fees paid by participants are expected to reach another $100 million a year.

The goal is to bring 20,000 young Diaspora Jews to Israel each year on long-term visits.

Allan Hoffman, director general of JAFI's Education Department, said the goal of having one in five young Jews from the Diaspora in Israel for a long-term program will have a "transformative impact on Jewish life.

"I believe this is one of the few avenues open to us to really build a next generation of Jewish people into the future," he said.

Hoffman said coming to Israel for an extended stay takes the experience to a different level than coming as a tourist.

"You can have a wonderful experience as a tourist, but you're always an outsider looking in," he said.

The gap can be narrowed, he said, "if we can create a generation of young Jews who feel like insiders in their experience with Israel and Israelis."

Participants, aged 18 to 26, have dozens of programs to choose from, ranging from studying at Israeli universities, yeshivas and music conservatories to volunteering on kibbutzim, working with immigrants and underprivileged youths or doing professional internships.

During the 2004-2005 school year, Masa's pilot year, $10 million was invested in the program.

Last month, more than 2,000 students who had spent all or part of the year in Israel gathered at an amphitheater at Beit Guvrin National Park south of Jerusalem to celebrate the official launch of Masa with music, dancing and speeches.

Sharon met with the young people and encouraged them to continue their connection to Israel, either by making aliyah or becoming community leaders and supporters of Israel back home.

"Today, we are taking a giant step toward the time when living in Israel for a period of time will be an inseparable part of the life of every Jewish youngster around the world, just as the Land of Israel is an inseparable part of our identities as Jews," Sharon said.

The program marks the first time the government has allocated such a large sum of money specifically for the Diaspora, cabinet secretary Yisrael Maimon said.

"There is a lot of criticism of the government about the decision at a time when there is poverty and budget cuts," Maimon said.

But citing the rise in intermarriage and the decrease of young Diaspora Jews remaining active in their communities, Maimon said the government decided it was time to act.

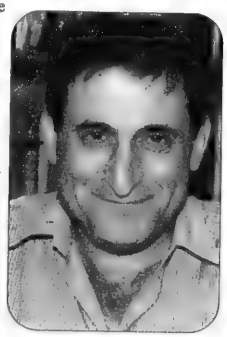
Masa is the brainchild of Sallai Meridor, the outgoing head of JAFI. Meridor made an emotional speech to the Masa participants.

"You, the Jewish youth, you are the future of the Jewish nation. We all have just one country. We will safeguard it forever. The government of Israel and the Jewish Agency are with you in safeguarding the future of the Jewish nation. We will bring together tens of thousands of Jewish youth to Israel," he said.

The crowd applauded wildly with Meridor's final words, "Am Yisrael chai."

Researchers have found that Jews who spend extended stays in Israel when they are young have a higher chance of either making aliyah or becoming active, committed members of their communities back home.

According to a study of participants in the Young Judaea year course, a program for North American high school graduates who spend a year in Israel before going to college, 91 per cent go on to marry Jews.



Sallai Meridor

A study of another post-high school program, Machon LeMadrechai Chutz LeAretz – which Russell was on this year – found that 40 per cent of graduates have made aliyah.

Elan Ezrachi, director of Masa, described birthright israel – the free, 10-day trips to Israel for Diaspora youth – as an "appetizer" for Masa. On birthright, young Jews often get their first taste of Israel, but longer experiences are needed to cement the connection to the country and their Jewish identities, Ezrachi said.

Russell said he was amazed by the range of experiences he had in Israel.

He changed locations about every six weeks. Among the places he stayed was the city of Safed in the Galilee. It was there that he volunteered to teach English to Druze children as part of the United Jewish Israel Appeal's work in the region. The UJIA, Britain's largest Jewish philanthropy, invests in Jewish education in the United Kingdom and Israel.

Like Russell, Robin Zebroitz, 23, of Atlanta also had a busy year – teaching swimming and English, hauling plants in an organic greenhouse and living in a center for new immigrants from Ethiopia, France, South Africa and Yemen.

"It's an absolutely phenomenal, invaluable experience," Zebroitz said of her year in Israel. "The things I have done here, the friends I have made, the connections are something you can only do if you are here for longer."

Park a 'fitting memorial' to Dolphinarium victims

By WENDY ELLIMAN
Israel Press Service

For the past four years, Irena Sklyanik has kept the bedroom of her daughter Yulia, who was killed at age 15, just as Yulia left it – her bed covered with stuffed toys, the walls covered with posters.

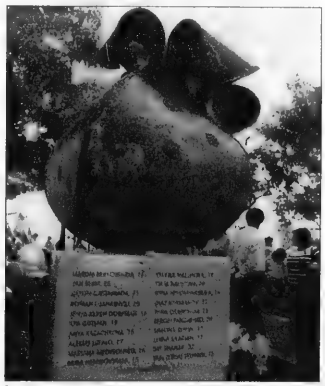
Simona Rudin's father cherishes the memory of his daughter, aged 17 when she died, by dancing the salsa, as they once danced it together. Simona's mother has made her daughter's room a virtual shrine of photographs, flowers and candles.

All the parents of the 21 people, mostly teens, killed by a suicide bomber on June 1, 2001, as they waited outside a popular beachfront discotheque opposite Tel Aviv's Dolphinarium nurture the memory of their dead children in their own way.

Now they have a special place to do so.

"The memorial we chose to build is a park with a children's playground," Sklyanik says. "Those who died at the Dolphinarium were youngsters who never got a chance to become parents. Even though their children and our grandchildren will never be born, life goes on and there are still children to whom we can bring joy."

The one-acre Memorial Park in southeast Tel Aviv is the result of four years of the families' grief-filled efforts to rebuild their lives. Most of the victims, along with 164 more who were injured in the bombing, were high school students who had immigrated to Israel from the former Soviet Union with their parents in the 1990s.



In the centre of the new Memorial Park is an imposing copper pomegranate mounted on a large jagged stone inscribed with the names of the 21 who died.

Roman Dezanshvili of Bat Yam, for example, had come to Israel from Georgia in 1994 with his brother and his mother Zena.

"I moved my family to Israel for the sake of my children," Zena says. "I'd been a teacher of Russian in Georgia, but in Israel I worked as a cleaner, and I did it gladly for my sons. Now Roman is dead. He lived only 21 years."

Being new to Israel made dealing with the bombing's aftermath particularly challenging for the families.

"Trauma and tragedy happen both to new immigrants and veteran Israelis," says a psychologist who works with the support group created by the Tel Aviv municipality for the bereaved parents. "Newcomers, however, usually have a far harder time coping, because they rarely have the same social network, financial resources or workplace support of those who have lived here for many years. Still reeling from the trauma of immigration, it's another mighty blow."

Members of the support group bonded over the idea of remembering their loved ones.

"We didn't all know one another when our children died," Sklyanik says. "We met in the support group. Some of us became more involved, others less, but we all knew it was important not to forget or to let others forget. Our murdered children are part of the history of Israel and deserve to be memorialized."

The site of the Dolphinarium suicide bombing, where 21 youngsters died in June 2001. [IPS photos]

The idea for the park grew slowly. The bereaved families first planted olive trees, put together a booklet about their children, and made a DVD and an exhibit that has been shown in Israel and abroad. All were meant to reach beyond static photographs and show how their children lived.

In this spirit, they told the municipality of Tel Aviv that they wanted a living memorial to their children, not simply an engraved stone at the place they died.

"The idea of a physical location dedicated to these youngsters became increasingly important with each anniversary of their death," says a spokesperson for Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai. "As they're not buried in one single cemetery, there was no obvious site for a memorial ceremony."

The parents eagerly accepted the idea for a park. From five locations offered by the city, they chose Yad Eliyahu, a neighbourhood that's home to many new immigrants and children.

"A park existed on the site, but it was bleak and run-down," Sklyanik says.

"We started to look for the money needed to revive it. With help from friends of the Tel Aviv Foundation in England, we found it. Most of the money came from a group of 40 London families who understand our pain."

Israeli landscape architect Haim Kahanovich, who was charged with rebuilding the site, has designed a lyrical oasis of paths, shaded seating areas and play areas, all amid flowers and lawns.

In the centre of the park is an imposing copper pomegranate sculpted by Aharon Ben Arieh. It's mounted on a large jagged stone, designed by Varda Givoli, on which the names of the 21 who died are inscribed.

"Are we pleased with the park?" Sklyanik asks. "Yes, very pleased. Is it enough? No, nothing can ever compensate our children or ourselves for the years stolen from us. But we must be realistic. Nothing will bring them back.

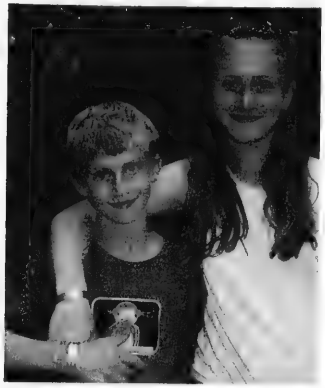
"This park is all we hoped it would be and more. It reflects youth and happiness, it is alive and joyous. It is a fitting memorial."

Heschel students sell bracelets for terror victims

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

Israelis are protecting Diaspora Jews' birthright in the Land of Israel, terror victim Sarri Singer told 115 students at the Toronto Heschel School earlier this month.

"With them protecting your little piece of Israel, it's your responsibility to give them support and show them that you care," Singer said at the launch of a three-day Heschel fundraising drive for the OneFamily Fund, which provides financial, legal and emotional assistance to Israeli survivors of terror.



Oliver and Andi Spring model their bracelets

Singer, who almost died in a 2003 suicide bus bombing in Jerusalem and is now East Coast director of OneFamily in the United States, told the students in grades 5 to 8 that despite her experiences, she still considers Israel a wonderful place and loves it very much.

The Heschel drive involved selling metal bracelets for $10 each that are inscribed with the name and age of an Israeli terror victim and the date they were killed. The students raised more than $700 to help send bereaved siblings of terror victims to camp.

As well, in order to connect with the survivors of terror and families of victims, each Heschel student received a Toronto-themed postcard to write a message on. The cards were then to be sent to the Israeli children at camp.

The fundraising drive was organized by Shane and Nancy Spring and their children Andi and Oliver. They became involved in OneFamily after a chance meeting in Israel with an old friend of Shane's, Pam Albert, OneFamily's Canadian director, who told them about the organization.

On their return to Toronto, they were invited to a OneFamily event, where they heard some of the Israeli guests speak about their personal experiences or about losing a child in an attack.

The next time a OneFamily group visited from Israel, the Springs hosted an event in their home. They also took their three Israeli guests, Shimon Levy and Yehezkel and Dalia Ozerov, to visit Niagara Falls.

Meanwhile, Andi and Oliver, together with their friends Jonah and Rebecca Himelfarb, helped organize the fundraising effort at Heschel.

"The children I know who have bought these bracelets do not want to take them off," Shane said.

"They seem committed to ensuring that the individuals did not die in vain and to ensure that their spirit will live on."

Volunteers with OneFamily, which describes itself as the "Israel Emergency Solidarity Fund," are in constant contact with victims of terror and their families.

Along with offering a compassionate ear, the volunteers also help distribute food and other material to survivors of terrorism, and they organize camps and retreats so survivors can get away and heal with people who have been through similar experiences.

In pursuit of a Zionist Dream

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Bureau

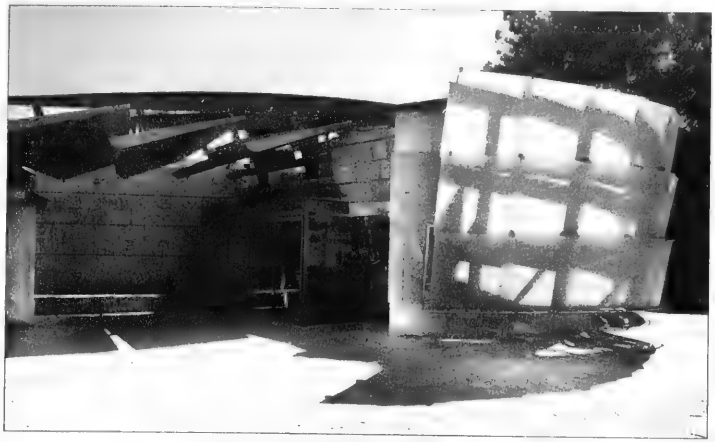
The new Herzl Museum uses state-of-the-art audio and visual aids to trace the life and times of the late Theodor Herzl and tell the story of his dream to have a Zionist homeland.

The museum, which opened last month on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem, a short distance from Herzl's grave, is a World Zionist Organization project supported by the Jerusalem Foundation. It is divided into four sections and it takes just over an hour to go through the complex from beginning to end.

Visitors can now select the sound commentary in Hebrew and English, but will eventually be able to choose from Russian, French, Spanish and German. The audio comes from different directions, adding to the experience.

At any given time, the museum can accommodate three different groups. Each group is limited to about 30 people, and it will be necessary to book a tour in advance to guarantee it will be available in the language chosen.

The journey through Herzl's world begins in a rectangular area made to look like a cobblestone street in Paris. One wall is covered by a huge television screen that shows two French soldiers from the 1890s talking about the famous trial of Alfred Dreyfus, a French Jewish officer who was wrongly charged with and found guilty of treason.



The exterior of the Herzl Museum.

In 1894, when anti-Semitism was rampant in the French army, the Dreyfus trial dominated the news. Herzl was a journalist at the time, working in Paris for a Viennese newspaper and he covered the trial and its aftermath.

After the story of Dreyfus is briefly told, the sound and pictures fade and the visitors' attention is drawn to the opposite wall, where another screen appears, as if from nowhere.

This time, the scene is set in modern times, inside a theatre, and the young Israeli actor Zak Berkman is talking to a well-known Israeli theatre director, Micha Levinson, who plays himself. Israeli actress Sandra Sadeh, the third person on the screen, plays the part of a coach who teaches Berkman about the life of Herzl, and how he should play the part. The idea is that as visitors proceed through the four sections, they will learn along with Berkman.

Another large screen reveals a busy, noisy Viennese café at the turn of the last century. Full-size fibreglass figures are seated at two of the café's tables, and a film in the background shows people in period costumes, including Berkman as Herzl.

This scene describes the Dreyfus trial and its influence on Herzl in his attempts to establish a Jewish homeland.

Herzl's personality will come alive

Using special effects and elaborate sets, the area in the room that initially resembled a Paris street disappears. A full-size window and door of a Paris book shop on one side, and Herzl's Paris study on the other side are revealed. The visitors are guided between the book shop and the study, through a metal door, and enter another phase of Herzl's life.

This section is an impressive re-creation of the Basel Municipal Casino. The museum guests take their places among the fibreglass audience and listen to the same raucous debate that was heard at the first Zionist Congress meeting in 1897.

Visitors are led out of the casino into a third section, a detailed re-creation of Herzl's study that contains most of his own artifacts and furniture. Some of these can be seen in contemporary photographs displayed outside the study.

The final section is in the form of a modern theatre with tiered seats. Its draped curtains rise to reveal yet another screen.

The video, which covers the period from the year Herzl died in 1904 to today, reviews Israel's achievements and its turbulent history.

With his trademark thick, dark beard, Herzl, still played by Berkman, addresses the visitors about a time that he never knew or saw. The audience is left to decide for themselves the degree of Herzl's success in making his dream of a Zionist state a reality.

While it is difficult to recreate the complexity of the Zionist story in such a short visit, Herzl's personality and achievements will come alive through this exhibit.

Herzl knew that you could not fight anti-Semitism in a conventional way. The only way was to give the Jewish people a state of their own. Although his vision did not come true until 44 years after his death, Herzl's name will always be associated with to the Zionist ideology.

The best cook in the IDF

By ELI STUTZ
CJN Israel Bureau

Maj. Aner Gottlieb of the Israel Defence Forces' logistics and technology corps was the winner of the IDF's second annual cooking contest for commanders – and thus the best cook in the Israeli army.

Seventeen IDF officers, including majors and lieutenant-colonels, took part in the contest.

"The competition is arranged by the logistics corps, but there was no favouritism involved," says Gottlieb, a 33-year-old father of one. "The contest is absolutely fair. The ingredients are kept secret until the start of the contest – that's part of the challenge."

Gottlieb emphasizes that all the ingredients used are available in a standard IDF kitchen. "A whole chicken, fresh spices, olive oil, balsamic vinegar, and all sorts of fruits and vegetables. Some ingredients are somewhat scarce around the country's bases, such as fresh pineapple. The vegetables are of five different colours."

He explains that the "five-colour vegetable campaign" is a recent Israeli health initiative to promote a well-balanced diet. The idea is to use the majority of these vegetables, but only up to a point. "If you use too many vegetables at once, you get shakshuka [an Israeli dish with fried eggs and tomato sauce] – in other words, a mess."

What was Gottlieb's strategy? "I made a boat out of a hollowed-out eggplant. This, I filled with other chopped up vegetables, and presto, I had ratatouille! Out of the whole chicken I made a chicken steak, marinated with wine. The sauce I concocted was 'silan,' which is made with date honey."

What put Gottlieb over the top was his inventiveness with the raw flour. "I decided to make home-made fettuccini, on the spot, with a little machine that I happened to have brought," he says. "I knew I had a tough fight when I saw a fellow competitor brandish a ravioli-making machine."

Gottlieb insists there was nothing in the rules against bringing such extra tools into the competition, but "I think it was the fettuccini that won me the contest."

Gottlieb's cooking is not limited to the base. "My wife doesn't cook at all," he says proudly.

Cooking is in the family, though. "My father served in the armoured corps, but when he entered the reserves, he became a cook and served as one for 25 years. Much of my cooking knowledge I owe to him."

One of the most famous foods in the IDF is "luf" which is a type of canned meat. Luf lasts for years and is shunned and loved at the same time.

"Don't underestimate luf," Gottlieb jokes. "Luf is part of me, and it will never leave me. You can make wonderful things out of this versatile meat. All the officers love it," he says, tongue firmly in cheek.

Gottlieb's unit reaped the rewards of his win – a 2,000-shekel prize, which will he said will be used to buy food products in civilian supermarkets. Gottlieb himself was awarded a watch, a chef's knife and a course in gourmet cooking.

The judges in the competition were a group of well-known Israeli chefs, including Phyllis Glaser, author of a series of popular Israeli cookbooks. "They were creative and gave it their best shot," Glaser said. "Some of the dishes were better than others, but on the whole it was a wonderful contest and I hope to see what I saw here put into practice in IDF kitchens."

Gottlieb says creativity was the key to his win. "I'm an adventurous chef. I check out the Internet for new ideas all the time." He admits that at home, his child prefers less adventure and more of the standard fare.

What is the secret of being a good chef? "The true secret is to mind the small details – like amounts, for example. You have to be precise. That's the secret of success in anything you do. Also, the curiosity to learn and to develop needs to be part of cooking. That's also true for everything."

The contest was broadcast on Israeli television's channels 2 and 10.

Despite his success, Gottlieb says he's not planning to go pro yet. "For now, only my wife will enjoy my cooking abilities. It's a kind of a hobby – to clear my mind. When you come home, and you're tired of the humdrum of army life, you cook.

"Being a good cook doesn't necessarily make you a better soldier, or a better person," says Gottlieb, "but it's fun."

The myth of the 'right of return'

By JACK CHIVO

It is a sign of our times that some "urban legends" never die. They continue to resurface, in spite of overwhelming evidence contradicting their myths and fabrications.

I was reminded of this truism after reading that the new Jordanian ambassador to Israel, Marouf Bakhit, has advised the government in Jerusalem to revisit and reconsider the so-called "right of return" for Palestinian Arabs, as a sign of goodwill toward the Palestinian Authority and its new President Mahmoud Abbas.

The problem with the ambassador's proposal is that there is no international law or binding United Nations resolution specifically mentioning the alleged right of Arab Palestinians to return to Israel, nor was such a right ever implemented, or even recognized, for any other group among the hundreds of millions of refugees from countries around the world. Nonetheless, references to the phoney "right of return" can be found on countless websites, and it is being bounced around at anti-Israel rallies, in papers and in other propaganda forums.

The problem with such faulty and specious arguments, which continue to be quoted on a regular basis as part of the Arab and leftist anti-Israel propaganda, is twofold. On one hand, the propagandists surely know that there is no legal or international basis for such a right, but on the other hand, they continue to flog this dead issue, counting on people's lack of knowledge or interest in doing their homework.

To understand the dimension of this ongoing fraud, one can look at some often-quoted UN resolutions, but, more importantly, at the basic international law governing the treatment of refugees for more than 50 years.

The refugee problem was first recognized after the end of World War I, when the world was flooded with people fleeing persecution by the nations newly created from the ruins of the Russian, Ottoman and Austro-Hungarian empires. After a number of international conferences (in 1926, 1928, 1933, and 1939), all previous decisions were enhanced and consolidated in the Geneva Convention, or, as it is legally known, the "1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees" (July 28, 1951).

If one reads the words of the convention carefully, the first thing that is crystal clear, is that the status of being a refugee is granted only to a person who has fled or was forced to flee a certain country or territory, but never to their children, grandchildren or other relatives, nor to fourth or further generations. The logical reasoning was that if the convention extended these rights beyond the original refugees, it would have created unrest and crisis for centuries to come.

As an example, one can only imagine the worldwide implications if the same "right of return" as that demanded by the Arab Palestinians was to be sought by the more than a hundred million heirs of the refugees created after the partition of the Indian subcontinent now living in India, Pakistan and Bangladesh, in addition to the many more millions abroad.

The same could be true for the hundreds of thousands of Japanese removed by the Soviets from the Kurile Islands after the end of World War II, the heirs and extended families of Tibetans and the Greek Cypriots, Tartarians, Kurds, Romanians, Poles and other displaced persons. It could be even claimed by the Acadians living in Louisiana, and others.

One of the most glaring examples that has come into focus over the past few years is that of the former German and Hungarian citizens expelled from Czechoslovakia and Poland after the liberation, where many had previously lived for seven to 10 centuries. While it was true that many people of German extraction collaborated with the Nazi invaders during the war, the 1946 Benes decree in Czechoslovakia did not differentiate between the guilty and the innocent, resulting in a wholesale expulsion of almost every person belonging to the German and Hungarian ethnic groups, and the total confiscation of their assets. The same thing happened in Poland and in the former district of Koenigsberg in Germany, which was taken over by the Soviets as reparation for the Nazi war pillage.

Mahmoud Abbas

In 2002, the negotiations dealing with the request by Poland and the Czech Republic to join the European Union brought to the forefront the fate of those refugees and their heirs, now numbering around 20 million, mostly located in Austria and Bavaria, and their demands, not even to return or to have a complete restoration of their assets, but to receive recognition of the injustice perpetrated against them and some form of moral and financial compensation.

Incredibly, the same European countries that are demanding flexibility from Israel in dealing with the alleged Palestinian refugees were adamant that there was no "right of return" for the Germans, nor had they any claim to compensation or any form of recognition. The Czech parliament reacted immediately, in April 2002, by unanimously adopting a resolution declaring the Benes decree as lawful, and not subject to any revision or interpretation. The Polish government implemented a similar law, while the governing body of the European Union totally rejected any attempt to link the "refugee matter" to the application for membership by the governments in Prague and Warsaw.

As the British magazine The Economist wrote in its Aug. 15, 2002, issue, "The most the Sudeten German can hope for, say the insiders, is a statement of regret and a few monuments."

Almost three years later, nothing has been offered, nothing has been erected, and this will probably never happen. Case closed! The same is true for the Poles from western Ukraine, the Cypriots, the Japanese, the Tibetans, the Indians, Pakistanis and others. The idea is kept alive for the Palestinian Arabs only!

It is interesting to note that some of the arguments used in dealing with the fate of the former German refugees could be found in the Geneva Convention, and they apply perfectly to the Palestinian Arabs as well. The statutes of the convention include a number of rules dealing with the "exclusions" from refugee status. In the statutes of the Convention, they are called the "cessation clauses." One of them states that the "convention shall cease to apply to any person failing under the terms of the Section A [defining the status of a refugee] if… he has acquired a new nationality and enjoys the protection of the country of his nationality."

Which begs the question of all those people claiming refugee status in the West Bank, Gaza and east Jerusalem. Why? Because while perusing the version of events found on the official website of the Jordanian government, during the reign of the late King Hussein, (www.kinghussein.gov.jo), one can read the following revealing statement describing the status of those living in the territories taken over by Jordan in 1949: "All automatically became citizens of Jordan, a right that was offered in December 1949 to all Palestinians who wished to claim it… the Hashemite Kingdom offered the possibility of normal life to many people who would otherwise have remained stateless refugees."

Geneva rules were broken by the Arabs

The same website puts the number of initial refugees at about 500,000, a figure in line with the numbers quoted by most respectable Israeli historians. If one adds all those Palestinian Arabs now living in Canada, the United States, Europe and Australia enjoying the "protection" defined by the convention, the picture becomes even more precise.

But the Geneva Convention adds a few more rules concerning "exclusion" from refugee status. Under Paragraph F, it states that the "provisions of the convention shall not apply to any person with respect to whom there is serious reason for considering that… he has committed a serious non-political crime outside the country of refuge, prior to admission in that country as a refugee." And Article 2, "General obligations," states that "every refugee has duties to the country in which he finds himself, which require in particular that he conforms to its laws and regulations as well as measures taken for maintenance of public order."

These clear rules were broken not only by the Arabs who committed crimes against the Jewish population prior to fleeing in 1948-49, but also by the Palestinians during the Lebanese Civil War of the late 1970s and early '80s, during which more than 100,000 people were killed; in the Palestinians' attempt to take over the Kingdom of Jordan, three decades ago, that resulted in the bloody "Black September"; and in their collaboration with the Iraqi invaders in Kuwait in 1991.

It is revealing to learn that the European Union is in the process of tightening the cessation rules for those claiming refugee status there, by adding two new criteria. It would "exclude persons who have committed cruel crimes [terrorism] with a political objective" and those who "instigate or otherwise participate in such activities."

In the case of the alleged Palestinian refugees, if one removes those who initially obtained Jordanian citizenship, those who have become citizens of other countries, and the terrorists involved in crimes all over the world, and add the numbers lost through attrition, there are not many left entitled to be called refugees. A few years ago, an article in Ha'aretz put the total number of the original refugees still alive at between 20,000 and 30,000.

> No Security Council resolution has ever mentioned the 'right of return'

But we also have the canard of the "rights" allegedly guaranteed by some UN resolutions. Even a usually well-informed news agency – the Chinese Xinhua – reported the above-mentioned remarks by the Jordanian ambassador, with comments about the right of return "according to a Security Council resolution."

There is one small problem, however. No Security Council resolution has ever mentioned the "right of return" or, as a matter of fact, the words "Palestinian refugees." The sole resolution addressing, but only indirectly, the matter, is the well known Resolution 242, of November 22, 1967, dealing with the aftermath of the Six Day War.

When one reads the short, three-paragraph resolution, it does not include the words "Palestinian," "Arab" or "right to return." One can only find, squeezed between two strongly articulated articles, the phrases "guaranteeing the freedom of navigation" and "guaranteeing the territorial inviolability and political independence of every state in the area"; and a tepid sentence that vaguely mentions the "necessity [of] achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem." This is the extent of the only UN Security Council resolution dealing with the refugees at that time.

I must add that, during the debates before the resolution was adopted, the matter of all refugees, Jewish and Arab, was mentioned, and it is important to note that the resolution kept the reference very ambiguous to leave room for a wider interpretation of the problem.

The other contemporary, often quoted United Nations document dealing with the refugees, is the General Assembly's Resolution 194 of December 1948, which, by its status, is considered a non-binding resolution. As a matter of fact, it wasn't even a full-fledged resolution, but a simple "Progress Report of the United Nations Mediator," adopted in the middle of Israel's War of Independence.

There are three interesting facts to note about this resolution.

First, it contains a number of demands from the parties involved, during a time when the young Jewish state was fighting for its very existence, attacked by armies from five Arab countries and the Palestinian Arabs. It was a ceasefire roadmap, including cessation of hostilities, free travel for all inhabitants, free access to all holy places, full recognition of all states in the area.

Only in Article 11, out of 15, was there the following statement:

The resolution "resolves that the refugees wishing to return to their home and live in peace with their neighbours should be permitted to do so at the earliest feasible date, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those not choosing to return and for loss or damage to property which, under principles of international law and equity, should be made good by the Governments or authorities responsible."

Second, as with 242, nowhere were the words Arab or Palestinian mentioned, and it is clear that it applied to Jews and Arabs alike at a time when not only were Jews in areas under Arab control being either massacred or chased away, but tens of thousands of Jews in Muslim countries were being subjected to persecutions, pogroms and confiscation of their assets.

Finally, another fact rarely mentioned is that all the Arab countries that were then members of the UN – Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon, Yemen, Saudi Arabia and Syria – voted against the resolution. None of the articles was ever accepted by the Arab states, and surely none was implemented. It must be the peak of chutzpah now, almost 60 years later, to have the same Arab countries and their fellow Arab dictators who defiantly rejected the resolution asking that one single article must be respected – and for the Arabs only!

There is one other interesting aspect to be added to this myth of the right of return: the fact that it is often peddled by some so-called "human rights" groups as part of an enlightened humanistic struggle for worldwide human rights, which, in realty, is only a thin cover for pure anti-Israel propaganda.

One of the organizations involved in the defence of the Palestinian "rights" is a group called "Rabbis for Human Rights" (RHR), based in Israel, which is supported by a grant from the Ford Foundation, the same fund that poured millions of dollars into organizing the 2001 World Conference against Racism in Durban.

In the early part of 2004, I conducted a lively exchange of messages with Rabbi Arik Ascherman, the RHR executive director, after finding on its website a link to the Palestinian group Adalah, a strong proponent of the "right of return," and learning that RHR was conducting a campaign of defending the property rights of Arabs and Palestinians in Israel and the territories.

As RHR defines itself as a proponent of both Jewish and Arab rights, I suggested that the group add a simple sentence to their statement concerning the property rights for the Arabs, stating that they also defend the property rights of the 850,000 Jews forced to flee Muslim countries after 1945, along with the rights of other dispossessed Jews around the world.

In January 2004, I wrote to Rabbi Ascherman: "Could you please reveal to me any action on behalf of the 850,000 Jews who were forced to abandon their properties some 40 or 50 years ago?… Aren't we also worth your efforts?"

After a few more letters from me, Rabbi Ascherman agreed to present the idea to the RHR board of directors meeting of May 2004. Without any comments, I want to conclude with a quote from the reply I received from Rabbi Ascherman on May 6, 2004: "As I wrote to you myself [earlier]… we are not interested in putting out a statement about every subject just because it is important."

American finds his calling as an Israeli tour guide

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

When Jonathan Duitch leads an Israeli tour bus, "you better listen, dude!" That's the type of thing Duitch would say.

An American-born transplant to Israel since 1979, Duitch was one of many tour guides leading Canadian March of the Living participants to, from and around the Galilee region.

What made Duitch unique was his style. Beneath a well-worn cap and clothes were a yarmulke, a tzitzit, and a true-blue rocker.

He sees himself as something of a "Deadhead," a lifelong fan of the rock group the Grateful Dead. He also lives for the music of Bob Dylan.

The Grateful Dead "was my early passion," said Duitch, a soft-spoken, laid-back guy who connects with kids. In this case, the teens were on Montreal bus number 4.

He sprinkled his bus-tour rap – full of in-depth knowledge and love of the Bible and Israel – with hip lingo and came across as one cool 43-year-old Orthodox guy.

"Why do I love being a tour guide? Because you can transmit something you can feel but not touch," Duitch said in an interview. "You see so many people, and there is a certain chayn [transcendent beauty] in their eyes."

Israeli tour guide Jonathan Duitch says, "If you find the job you like, you never work again the rest of your life."

There seems to be no doubt that as average Israelis go, Duitch isn't average.

He grew up in a traditional Jewish family in Omaha, Neb., which has only about 5,000 Jews.

Brought up with a strong Zionist spirit with two siblings – both of whom still live in the United States – Duitch always knew he would wind up living in Israel. And at age 18 he moved there.

It took Duitch, a bohemian, years before he found his calling in tourism. He attended Columbia University – where he earned a BA – returning to the U.S., for a time, and attending a couple of yeshivas. At one point, he thought he could make his fortune by opening up a chain of popcorn stands in Israel. He had a stand in the heart of Jerusalem.

Duitch was once a busker, playing guitar for shekels, and even started his own guitar-making company.

"I gave one to Eric Clapton," he said.

Maybe Duitch's most unusual venture was to co-create one of Israel's first Israeli comic book superheroes, named Uri Om, in the late 1980s. The company produced only a half dozen or so issues, but the project got widespread media attention and even achieved cult status.

"People talk about it to this day," Duitch said.

Because of an innate love of people and Israel, Duitch enrolled in a tour- guide course. He has been a guide since 1993. In 1994, he began to serve as a guide for March of the Living groups and has been doing that regularly ever since.

"I just love it," Duitch said. "It's like they say: 'If you find the job you like, you never work again the rest of your life.' From every person you teach, you learn something. I know what I know, but I have a lot to learn."

Duitch met his wife, Laurie, in 1979, and now lives a more conventional life than he used to in Jerusalem with his children, Merav, 16, Nadiv, 13, and Naomi, 11.

Duitch insisted he was not just saying so when he praised Canadians as the best tourists and March of the Living participants to lead.

"It's really true," he said. "They are closer than any other group, and compared to Americans, even an assimilated Canadian Jew is still very Jewish. You can feel it."

Further Israeli withdrawals not automatic, columnist says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Further Israeli withdrawals after Israel's planned pullout from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank are not necessarily on Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's agenda, says the former director of the Israel Government Press Office.

"We may apply other criteria to the rest of Judea and Samaria," Yossi Olmert said in a recent interview in Toronto. "Gaza is not a precedent to be copied automatically. No one should think Gaza is a recipe for the future. We should consider our national rights in Judea and Samaria."

Sharon's government will not offer the Palestinians the sort of sweeping territorial concessions in the West Bank his predecessor Ehud Barak was apparently willing to make, Olmert warned.

"No one should expect it," said Olmert, an academic, journalist and brother of Israel's deputy prime minister and former mayor of Jerusalem Ehud Olmert. "This government is not in the business of surrendering to the Palestinians."

Olmert, an adviser to former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir, described Israel's decision to vacate Gaza as a "litmus test" for the Palestinians' willingness to curb terrorism.

Olmert is "very skeptical" that the Palestinian Authority, headed by Mahmoud Abbas, will deal forcefully with terrorism.

Yet he believes the Palestinians have shown clear signs of fatigue with the chaos that has enveloped Gaza since the eruption of the second intifadah in 2000.

Olmert, who writes a political column for Yediot Achronot, Israel's largest daily, cautioned the Palestinians that Israel is not leaving Gaza out of weakness or due to international pressure.

"We had to rationalize our national priorities, to disengage from a large part of the Palestinian population, in the interests of resolving the demographic problem and maintaining the political initiative."

Yossi Olmert

Nevertheless, Olmert is not an enthusiastic backer of the Gaza withdrawal plan, set to be activated in August.

"One can't be sure about it because we don't exactly know what will happen after we leave. The Palestinians shouldn't misinterpret it as a victory. If terror continues, the Israel Defence Forces will deal the Palestinians a major blow."

Short of "an apocalyptic event," Israel has every intention of carrying out the withdrawal, he said.

In his view, Israel should tear down the buildings in the settlements scheduled to be left behind. "The Palestinians don't deserve any gifts from us."

The Israeli government, however, is "vacillating" on this issue, he said.

Olmert is far from impressed with Abbas' leadership. "Arafat was clearly the worst of the lot," he said, referring to the late president of the Palestinian Authority, Yasser Arafat. "But that doesn't mean Abbas is the best."

In a scathing indictment of Abbas, Olmert said, "Rhetoric is not enough. As yet, he's not delivered the goods under the ["road map" peace plan]. The Palestinians have not even begun to dismantle the terror infrastructure."

Asked whether Israel has fulfilled its reciprocal obligations under the road map, he replied, "The first obligation is for the Palestinians to dismantle terror. Without it, nothing will happen."

In Olmert's judgment, the intifadah has essentially ended.

"We've basically won the battle. We've dramatically reduced the levels of violence, our economy is rebounding and life is returning to normal. We're on top of the situation."

Olmert, who once headed the Syria and Lebanon desks at Tel Aviv University's faculty of Middle East studies, dismissed recent overtures by the Syrian regime to resume bilateral negotiations.

"Syria pays lip service to peace and supports terror," he said. "I don't take seriously what they say."

Even if there is a resumption of talks, he opposes a full Israeli evacuation of the Golan Heights.

He suggested Israel should not engage Syria in talks unless it assumes a role in disarming Hezbollah and ousts Islamic Jihad from Damascus.

Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon five years ago was beneficial to Israel, he noted. "But I regret it was done under pressure and not carried out in an orderly and responsible way."

Olmert was in Toronto at the invitation of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Sharon has dropped greater Israel goal: Peace Now

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has reached the historic conclusion that a greater Israel, encompassing most of the territories, is neither possible nor in Israel's strategic or demographic interests, says Mark Rosenblum, the founder and political director of Peace Now in the United States.

Sharon, nevertheless, wants to keep a fairly substantial chunk of the West Bank once Israel withdraws from the Gaza Strip and four isolated settlements in the northern West Bank in the summer, he noted in an interview.

"He understands you can't have a greater Israel unless you engage in ethnic cleansing. He's made the choice in favour of a smaller Israel."

Rosenblum, here to deliver a speech to Canadian Friends of Peace Now, said Sharon is essentially engaged in "a salvaging operation." His long-range objective is to "save" what he can of the West Bank, with all its settlement blocs.

In the meantime, he said, Sharon should work together with the Palestinians so as not to leave the impression Israel is withdrawing from Gaza under fire.

Mark Rosenblum

Rosenblum claimed Sharon has no interest in negotiating a permanent status arrangement on such issues as final borders and the Palestinian refugee problem. Sharon's goal is to sign interim agreements with his Palestinian counterpart, Mahmoud Abbas.

Rosenblum said a Palestinian state with provisional borders, as set out by the road map to peace, may be what Sharon has in mind for now.

Sharon, though, is pulling in two different directions.

On the one hand, he is going through with his Gaza disengagement plan. On the other hand, he is turning a blind eye to the expansion of illegal outposts in the West Bank and building a separation fence on land claimed by Palestinians.

He said the United States wants Abbas to succeed, hoping he can close the yawning gap between his intentions, which are good, and his capacities, which are weak.

Rosenblum, a professor of history at Queens College in New York, is finishing two books about the Middle East. The first deals with the Oslo peace process and the Palestinian uprising. The second is on Jerusalem.

Oslo failed for basically three reasons, he observed. Israel continued to build settlements, the Palestinians did not rein in terrorism and the United States failed to monitor both sides' compliance with the accord.

The intifadah was not a planned revolt, he claimed. But Arafat was willing to use violence for political ends. Still, the scope of the uprising surpassed even his own intentions.

As for Jerusalem, Rosenblum thinks a diplomatic solution, in accordance with parameters drawn up by former U.S. president Bill Clinton, is possible.

Israel and the Palestinians should divide the city on the basis of its Jewish and Arab neighbourhoods and continue negotiating the status of the Temple Mount.

Rosenblum also spoke to members of Canadian Friends of Peace Now in Montreal and met with officials from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Ottawa

Immigrants account for small rise in Jewish population, study finds

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Immigration has been – and likely will continue to be – the key to the growth of Canada's Jewish population, suggests the latest in a series of reports on the community's composition and direction.

"Without the mitigating effects of immigration, the Jewish population would have certainly experienced a decline rather than a slight increase," notes the report on immigration and language, part five in a series of studies by UIA Federations Canada based on the results of Canada's 2001 census.

Numbers would have fallen without newcomers

The census found that Canada's Jewish population rose by a modest 3.5 per cent between 1991 and 2001, to just over 370,000. It was one of the lowest rates of growth among religions and other ethnic groups, and sounded alarm bells among communal leaders on the need to increase the Jewish birthrate and boost immigration.

The study on immigration found that the same decade saw the highest total of Jewish newcomers to this country since World War II: 32,340, or nearly nine per cent of all Canadian Jews.

Half that number – 16,295 –

Cotler the Maccabian!

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, 65, will take a break from fielding shots in the House of Commons to compete in the master's table tennis event at the Maccabiah Games in Israel next month.

"I've been playing ever since I was a kid, but I haven't played for a long time. I may end up being an embarrassment to the game, but my enthusiasm will be there," Cotler told The CJN.

The master's division in Maccabiah table tennis is for competitors over 35.

Cotler did not have to qualify because he was the only Canadian entrant for the event, said Maccabi Canada national athletic committee chair Allen Gerskup.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Circumcision Record

TORONTO — The Jewish Russian Community Centre of Toronto flew in a specially trained mohel this month to perform a brit milah on three adults, including one 77-year-old who became the oldest member of Toronto's Russian Jewish community to be circumcised. The JRCC's Rabbi Yisroel Karpilovsky called it "a most beautiful and joyous occasion – a truly amazing thing." Many Jews from the former Soviet Union were never circumcised, and the JRCC offers to perform the ritual free of charge.

Lawyers Get Awards

TORONTO — Former Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy received the Law Society of Upper Canada's fourth annual Lincoln Alexander Award last week for his work for human rights and religious tolerance, the society said. The award is named for the former Ontario lieutenant governor. Ex-Ontario attorney general Charles Harnick and lawyer Linda Rothstein were among eight others who received the Law Society Medal for contributions to their community and profession.

Man Fights to Stay

TORONTO — An Israeli Arab who defrauded Muslims and Islamic groups, including terror organizations, is pleading with Ottawa not to deport him to Israel because he fears for his life. Nazareth native Mohammed Mustaf Agbareia, 39, is a career con artist who has already been deported from Canada twice. He is also wanted in Michigan and New York and has been convicted of fraud in England. Agbareia, who lives in Brampton, Ont., with his wife and son, is fighting a third deportation order. "I have self-admittedly been involved in criminal activities relating to the defrauding of monies from Islamic organizations, including Hamas and Al Aqsa Brigades," he said in support of his bid to stay.

Fund Fraud Alleged

TORONTO — The Israeli co-founder of Portus Alternative Assets Management misappropriated $3.2 million (US) of the hedge fund's money, its court-appointed examiner KPMG alleges. According to court filings, Boaz Manor, who fled to Israel in March after Portus' collapse and after a judge ordered him to speak to KPMG, put $2.5 million in offshore accounts and paid his lawyer with the rest, Bloomberg News reported.

WORLD

Deportation Upheld

CLEVELAND — Ex-Nazi death camp guard John Demjanjuk can be deported from the United States. A U.S. judge ruled earlier this month that Demjanjuk, 85, has until June 30 to appeal his deportation for serving at the Sobibor, Majdanek and Flossenburg camps, and lying about his service when he applied to enter the United States in 1952. Demjanjuk, a Ukrainian national who lives near Cleveland, was acquitted in Israel in 1993 of being "Ivan the Terrible," a notorious Nazi guard.

Kippah Suit Settled

PHOENIX — Blockbuster recently agreed to pay $50,000 (US) to an ex-employee in Scottsdale, Ariz., who was fired for wearing a kippah. Under terms of the consent decree with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the video chain also agreed to change language in its personnel policy, and to apologize to Leonard Teplitsky, who was 17 when he filed his complaint two years ago.

Priest Defended...?

PARIS — A group of priests defended their founder, saying he was not anti-Semitic, but rather opposed Jews' "capitalistic views." The defence came after the beatification of Leon Dehon by the Catholic Church was blocked because of his writings. The priests of the Order of Sacre-Coeur defended him in a Belgian magazine. The problem Dehon saw with the Jews, his biographer states, was with their capitalistic economic and social policies, not their "racial" character.

U.S., Israeli Jews Back Pullout, New Poll Says

NEW YORK — Most U.S. Jews and Israelis support the Israeli government's plan to withdraw from the Gaza Strip, a Yeshiva University poll has found.

Some 65 per cent of American Jews support the withdrawal plan, with 21 per cent opposed, according to the YU Poll of Jewish Life and Opinion.

The poll surveyed 1,000 American Jews and 1,000 Israeli Jews on a range of issues, from the war in Iraq to U.S. President George W. Bush and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Among Israeli Jews, 54 per cent support the plan, with 41 per cent opposed. As well, 70 per cent of U.S. Jews and 59 per cent of Israeli Jews think Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is "genuinely interested in peace."

But 58 per cent of U.S. Jews and 80 per cent of Israeli Jews think Abbas must dismantle terrorist groups to jumpstart the peace process, and just 27 per cent of U.S. Jews and 28 per cent of Israeli Jews think he will do so.

Canadian olim prepare to take the plunge

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

After months of support group meetings and activities for the kids, seven Toronto area families will join 200 other Canadians on July 12 in fulfilling a dream of making aliyah.

With one flight from Toronto and one from New York, two planeloads of olim will arrive simultaneously at Ben-Gurion Airport in Israel.

Throughout the summer, at least four more flights will bring olim to Israel with the help, support and guidance of Nefesh B'Nefesh, an organization that charters flights and offers assistance to North Americans who are making aliyah.

This is the first time since Nefesh B'Nefesh began operating three years ago that one of its flights will be leaving from Toronto. In the past, Canadian olim would leave from New York, but this has changed because the number of Canadian olim has continued to climb.

This year, the Jewish Agency for Israel's Toronto-based Israel Aliyah Centre expects that 400 Canadians, mostly Torontonians, will move to Israel.

Nicky Halpert and Ruth Sherman are two Canadian olim who are both excited and anxious to make the move. They've been preparing for more than six months using help from Nefesh B'Nefesh and the Aliyah Centre, and by arranging meetings with other new olim.

"The meetings have been ongoing since January as a way to offer the olim some guidance and support to make the transition from one life to another smoother," said Sherman, a mother of four.

The seven families' younger children, who ranged in age from six to 12, met every other Monday with four young Israeli women who came to Canada as teachers to fulfil their national service commitment as an alternative to serving in the army.

"It ended up being a way [for the kids] to learn more about Israeli society and learn about the army. They learned a couple songs, learned a few card games – basically things that other Israeli kids grow up with that our kids might be lacking," Sherman said.

"The idea originally was to do some Hebrew, so they would learn some more conversational Hebrew, play sports and games in Hebrew, but there ended up being way too many kids," Halpert added.

Although finding a teacher that would take on about 20 kids proved to be too difficult, the meetings continued for those who sought support.

"There's strength in numbers," Sherman said. "It helps when you're not the only one going through it."

Serving the Jewish Community since 1927.

Greater Toronto Area

He fought for Israel's honour

From the editor's desk

When we read the pages of history, we tend to forget that the "macro" events of a nation's past were but the forward flows of the decisions of "micro" individuals. The stories of great moments – whether defined for ill or for good – therefore, are also always the stories of great men and women whose uniqueness of character nevertheless houses too, the imperfection of character that are both the flaw and the glory of all human beings.

One such great man was Yaacov Herzog.

Little known, let alone remembered these days, by two generations that have been born after the birth of the State of Israel, Herzog's all-too-short life was lived at the very centre of recent Jewish history. His decisions and indecisions, actions and inactions helped steer the course of that history.

His life's story is masterfully told by Michael Bar-Zohar in the recently published Yaacov Herzog A Biography (Halban Publishers Ltd.).

Bar-Zohar is the award-winning biographer of David Ben-Gurion, veteran Israeli author, teacher and former parliamentarian. Like all superior biographers, he simultaneously brings to life essentially two stories: that of his subject and of the momentous times and epochal events that were the backdrop, if also the very nub of his subject's life.

Yaacov Herzog was the younger son of the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of the State of Israel, Isaac Halevy Herzog. His older sibling was the late Chaim Herzog, the former president of the state. The entire family, it could be said, was involved in helping to steer those events.

Bar-Zohar openly describes the nature of the family's dynamics and its impact upon Herzog's development and ultimate life's work.

Born in Dublin, Herzog lived totally and effusively in two worlds: in the traditions and scholarship of his faith and in the nuances and intrigues of international politics. Both realms infused his soul and left their ineradicable signatures upon his character.

Herzog's "political" life began, as he himself once said, "by chance" in 1946 when he was "initiated into the Haganah to help evaluate international affairs and to take part in intelligence work".

Bar-Zohar captures it all, from well before 1946 when Herzog helped his father rescue Jewish orphans from the slaughtered communities of European Jewry, through his pivotal work for Ben-Gurion and other key leaders of the nascent state, to his career as a diplomat, his breakthrough contacts with the Vatican and his many secret meetings with the late King Hussein and other Arab leaders. The biography is rich in detail.

For Canadians, there is an especially compelling aspect to this biography. For Yaacov Herzog served as Israel's ambassador in Ottawa for two years. Indeed the photo inset is that of the ever-proper Herzog stepping down from the official landau en route to visit the Governor General to present his credentials. The man's uprightness of posture, keenness of focus and pride of purpose are patently evident in this archival snapshot.

It was merely six months after the young ambassador had assumed his post that one of the most famous events in Israel's diplomatic history and in Canadian Jewish communal life occurred.

In January 1961, the renowned and much-revered British historian Arnold Toynbee at Hillel House, no less, at McGill University, reiterated earlier criticisms of the Jewish religion and of the young Jewish state. He said that Judaism was a "fossilized civilization" and, more egregiously, that the Jews of Israel had treated the Palestinians in 1948 the way the Nazis had treated the Jews from 1933 to 1945.

When he heard the slanders, "Herzog was appalled."

"I decided on the spur of the moment," Herzog later wrote to a friend, "to challenge [Toynbee] to a public debate, as I saw no other way to balance the impact, all the more as I couldn't stand the situation in which I have to read and listen to his slander without trying to debate him before public opinion."

Bar-Zohar notes that the established Jewish community in Canada was not pleased with the prospect of the debate, going "so far as to form a delegation… to call on the ambassador at home to dissuade him from the risky adventure." But the ambassador would not be dissuaded.

The debate proceeded. It was electric and electrifying and all observers and listeners agreed that the ambassador bested Toynbee in all respects.

"Herzog's challenge to Toynbee," Bar-Zohar writes, "was a spontaneous reaction straight from the heart. At that moment, he was not a civil servant and government official, but an untitled spokesman of the Jewish people fighting for its honour, which was why he did not seek permission."

The biography of Yaacov Herzog is an important book for anyone interested in learning of the birth pangs – domestic and international – surrounding the creation of the State of Israel. Herzog helped usher the reborn Jewish state into the modern world. Alas, he died far too young, on March 6, 1972, at the age of 50. It was a loss to the entire Jewish world whose reverberations, some say, we feel to this day.

Israeli venture capitalists meet Canadian investors

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel and the province of Ontario took a step toward greater economic co-operation last week as eight Israeli venture capital firms held talks with Canadian investors considering partnerships in high technology investments.

Ephraim Shoham, Israel's trade commissioner for Canada, suggested that as much as $50 million to $100 million in venture capital projects could result from the meetings, which took place at two investment forums in Montreal and Toronto. The forums were sponsored by Israel's economic mission to Canada in association with the law firm of Heenan Blaikie and Senvest Capital.

Shoham arrived at the figure following discussions with forum participants "and based on experiences in other countries."

He said the forums led to 65 one-on-one meetings involving Canadian investors and representatives of the eight Israeli venture capital firms.

The Canadian participants included banks, pension funds, private investment companies and hospital foundations.

Last week's business meetings marked the first time Israeli venture capital firms had come to Canada as a group to promote investments in Israel. Each venture fund maintains a portfolio of start-ups in Israel, and each is looking for investors interested in getting in on the ground floor in a high tech industry, Shoham said.

The anticipated success of the forums marks a bounce back from the depressed state of Israel's high tech industry that followed the Nasdaq tech implosion and the uncertainty created by the Palestinian intifadah. Coupled with Israel's Gaza disengagement and with a memorandum of understanding, signed in April by Premier Dalton McGuinty and Israel's minister of industry and trade, Ehud Olmert, the time is ripe for venture capital partnerships, Shoham said.

Forums led to 65 one-on-one meetings

Venture capitalists invest money in start-up firms and provide managerial and other advice with the goal of mentoring the company until it's ready to launch its product. It's a high-risk endeavour that can offer high rewards when the company can be made widely available in an initial public offering or through an acquisition by a larger firm.

The memorandum of understanding established a joint research and development fund of $2 million to provide seed money to Israeli and Ontario companies in the early stages of product development.

Shoham said Israeli firms have been active in venture capital since the late 1980s and Israel remains an attractive locale for high tech investments.

Speaker after speaker at the Toronto forum highlighted Israel's high tech credentials. Israeli companies have developed products that have become part of daily life, and many high profile American technology companies have important branches there.

Israeli firms are responsible for developing the technology that goes into such items as Pentium MMX and Centrino chips, voice mail, cable modems, call centres, chips in cellphones, computerized customer management, video conferencing, voice over Internet and instant messaging.

Israel is also a leader in bio-pharma and medical devices. One company, Given Imaging, designed a pill camera that, when swallowed, allows physicians to see a patients' internal organs.

Israel trails only Canada in the number of foreign listings on the Nasdaq stock exchange, and Israel boasts more engineers per capita than any other country. As well, at 4.8 per cent of GDP, Israeli has the highest rate of R & D investment in the world.

Joseph Cordiano, Ontario's minister of economic development and trade, told the forum that Ontario and Israel share a common vision of economic development that includes trade, technological innovation, investment in R & D, and promoting innovation clusters that take advantage of seemingly disparate knowledge and skills.

The memorandum of understanding "recognizes our shared interest in encouraging innovation and economic growth… as well as acknowledging and encouraging our growing trade relationship," Cordiano said.

He recounted the cultural and business ties shared by Israel and Ontario, and added, "I want to see even more collaboration and partnership between Ontario and Israel. I believe for all of us, greater prosperity lies in the free flow of trade investment ideas and capital."

Later, in a brief discussion with conference participants, Cordiano referred to the Medical and Related Sciences (MaRS) Discovery District – a not–for–profit company founded by leaders of Canada's academic, business, and scientific communities – as "the jewel in the crown" that will help Ontario create the infrastructure to permit the private sector and scientists to collaborate in bringing innovative products to market.

Cordiano told The CJN that Israel "would be a fine fit" for projects developed through MaRS.

In 2002, two-way trade between Canada and Israel totaled nearly $1 billion, with 60 per cent of that involving Ontario.

The minister noted that trade between the two countries has increased 100 per cent since Canada and Israel signed a Free Trade agreement in 1997, eliminating almost all tariffs on manufactured products.

Alumni of Zimbabwe school hold reunion in Toronto

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

As Zimbabwe lies in disarray with a fast-sinking economy and people leaving daily, one school continues providing its pupils with a Jewish education, as it has since its opening in 1961.

The Sharon School in Harare was celebrated in Toronto recently with an erev Shavuot reunion of former pupils, parents and principal, Sue Holmes, at the home of a former student, Mark Friedlander.

Excited to have had the opportunity to meet up with all these "old faces" during her brief Toronto visit, Holmes said more than 50 people had a "heartwarming and fabulous time."

Organized by Janice Benatar, who Holmes taught when she was in Grade 3 (some two or three decades ago), the reunion "had the personal touch," according to the newly retired principal, a devout Christian who continues to teach Jewish studies three days a week and runs all the Shabbat and yom tov programs for the 205 elementary school children, 18 of which are Jewish, currently enrolled in Sharon School.

The grown-up Sharon pupils were also treated to a trip down memory lane by Holmes, who had brought a Powerpoint presentation of the school as it is today. This presentation, put together by one of her current Grade 7 students, saw the now grown-up men and women remarking, "Look how that tree has grown, I remember that..."

The Sharon School in Harare was celebrated in Toronto with a recent erev Shavuot reunion of former pupils and parents.

Holmes said that it was a perfect chance for everyone to "see one another, catch up and reminisce about our very special little school in Zimbabwe."

Writer sheds light on Mideast reporting

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

There are five characters in this journalism story – the "parachutist," the "barman," the analyst, news agencies and the fixer – and all help mould news on the Middle East for the enjoyment of viewers and readers.

So says Matthew Kalman, senior correspondent from Jerusalem for Time Magazine, the London Daily Mail and the San Francisco Chronicle, among others. And earlier this month, he gave his audience at Holy Blossom Temple a description of each character, explaining their roles in reporting on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Taken straight from the airport to the site of the story, the "parachutist" usually "hasn't the faintest idea what's going on," Kalman said.

These reporters are "just dropped into a story," arriving right in the middle of events.

For example, Kalman said, when CNN reporter Christiane Amanpour was covering the death of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, she spent most of her live broadcast answering, "I don't know" or making off-the mark guesses in response to anchors' questions.

In another instance, while on a press bus once, Kalman heard a fellow journalist telling some "parachutists" that the road the bus was on – Route 60 coming out of east Jerusalem – was known as "Sterile Road," because it's forbidden to Palestinian vehicles.

Knowing this to be a lie, Kalman watched as three Palestinian vehicles overtook the bus. He was waiting for the reporter to correct himself, but he didn't.

The journalist telling that story was the character Kalman referred to as "barman," because he spent more time at bars than out in the field, and thus had to rely on second-hand information from others.

While noting that in news reporting, analysis is essential, Kalman said that in relation to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, analysts are problematic.

Using CNN analysts as an example, Kalman said that on the Israeli side, independent ones are usually used to provide context, while on the Palestinian side, politicians who are "players in the game," are, more often than not, the ones used as analysts.

In all cases, the merit of a story is inevitably decided on by a news agency whose "word is the word of God," Kalman said.

If an agency reports on an incident, it's considered to have happened. If not, it didn't. "Both what they do and don't report is crucial," he added.

All news outlets use the agencies as a measure for what is and isn't newsworthy, he said.

Charity watchdog to weed out 'bad apples'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Tzedakah is one of the most important mitzvot in Jewish life. And Toronto, asserts Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah and secretary of the Vaad Harabonim, is known as a community that wants to help those in need.

But while most charity collectors are honest and honourable, there are unfortunately "a few bad apples," said Rabbi Tradburks and Tzvi Richman, chair of the newly formed Toronto Vaad Hatzdokah. Some exaggerate or even outright lie about the cause they are collecting for. They might be collecting for a perfectly genuine cause, but don't send the money where it is supposed to go.

To help donors determine if a cause is genuine or worthy, the Toronto Vaad Hatzdokah, with the encouragement and sponsorship of the Vaad Harabonim, has designed a certificate that all meshulachim, (charity collectors) must carry. The certificate is laminated so that the signature can't be tampered with, said Rabbi Tradburks, includes the collector's photograph and is issued for only one to four weeks at a time.

People who are approached to give money should demand to see this certificate, and if the collector doesn't have it, or if it is not current, they should not respond to the appeal.

Most of the door-to-door charity collectors come from Israel, Richman said. The Vaad Hatzdokah put ads in Israeli newspapers, inviting applications for certification. When the application reaches the organization, the credentials are checked carefully. "We contact people we know in Israel, or other honourable people, and make discreet inquiries. They have the reputation of being honest, so we can trust their judgment," said Richman.

They also check the institution that the collector says he is representing to ensure that it is a real institution and that the collector is authorized to represent it.

If the person is collecting for someone with a medical problem, Richman said, he calls the hospitals involved to make sure the story is correct.

If the collector fails to apply for certification from abroad, he can register once he reaches Toronto, but he has to wait until his credentials are confirmed before the certificate is issued and he can begin his efforts.

The Vaad Hatzdokah has also established an apartment where the collectors can stay during their time in Toronto. While not luxurious, Richman said, it is comfortable, and the cost is reasonable: $20 a night or $25 including a meal. "We aren't trying to make a profit," he said. "We just need to cover our costs, such as the janitor and the laundry."

Toronto is not the only city that has an organization such as Vaad Hatzdokah. There are between 18 and 20 in the United States and England, including Teaneck, N.J., Chicago, Baltimore and London, England. "We are in the process of forming an association of all the groups," Richman said.

Vaad Hatzdokah's board consists of Kurt Rothschild, Larry Zeifman, Josh Frankel, Joe Bitton, Bernie Heitner and Phil and Jeremy Weitz. "We work hand in hand with the Vaad Harabonim, setting policy, or dealing with tragedies," Richman said.

To contact the Toronto Vaad Hatzdokah, call 416-913-1774 or e-mail torontovaadhatzdokah@hotmail.com.

Disengagement and the Diaspora

In a matter of weeks, the government of Israel will undertake what is probably the most painful policy initiative – apart from a declaration of war – that any of the country's prior governments has had to implement in the state's 57-year history: the evacuation and relocation of the Jews in Gaza and four West Bank communities.

The individual and collective anguish of the impending evacuation can be felt throughout the country. The eviction and compensation laws have been passed by the Knesset, upheld by the Supreme Court, and the army stands at the ready to execute the orders to forcibly evict any families refusing to leave voluntarily. Although many, if not most, Gaza Jews have indicated they will leave of their own volition, the atmosphere is tense and growing more tense each day as opponents of disengagement step up their campaign of disruption and violent protest.

How the protesters hope to derail the process is not clear. Their strategy appears to be to cause maximum mayhem and hope the Knesset will reverse itself or at least suspend disengagement. If successful, their strategy has dangerous implications for the long-term viability of the country's democratic institutions. But one can understand, if not condone, agitated and anxious Israelis acting this way against their own government.

One cannot understand, however, let alone condone, anxious Jews of the Diaspora actively taking steps to undermine the legitimate authority of the duly-elected government of Israel. And yet, that is the effect, if not the expressed purpose, of a campaign recently announced by some of our fellow Diaspora Jews as typified by an advocacy pamphlet that was inserted in last week's issue of The CJN titled "Deconstructing the Disengagement."

The pamphlet is in the form of a restatement of "myths and facts" concerning disengagement. This editorial does not relate to or respond to the 10 specific items contained in the pamphlet except to broadly observe that they are framed in a self-serving, disingenuous and even deceptive way. It is not the merits of the "myths and facts" that are at issue, for they are really a statement of opinion. Reasonable people, as long as they are acting in good faith, will be entitled to differences of opinion.

And we certainly do not question the "right and even the moral obligation of every Jew," as the pamphlet states, to question the course of the actions of the government of Israel. But we do question the true end to which the pamphleteers are trying to steer us. Is it to recruit Diaspora Jews to support disruption and protest by Israeli Jews? If so, this is most inappropriate. And why do the pamphleteers not answer the one ultimate and irremovable question that lies at the heart of the disengagement policy? Irrespective of the accurate demographic trends between Israelis and Palestinians that the pamphleteers openly challenge, how should Israel deal with the Palestinians of Gaza without disengagement? Shall they all become Israeli citizens?

The status quo can no longer remain. This is not a matter of fiat by the international community. It is a matter of painful reality, of urgent planning by the Israeli government today to ensure its Jewish future tomorrow.

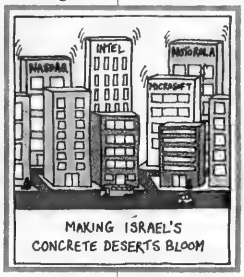
Jewish refugees from Arab lands

As the founding chairman of the Ontario region's and the national committees for Jews from Arab Lands of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and as a founding member of the World Organizations for Jews from Arab Countries (WOJAC), with former speaker of the Knesset, Mordechai Ben Porat, I was delighted to see that the Canadian government, represented by our prime minister, as well as the international Jewish community, represented by a new entity, Justice for Jews from Arab Countries, clearly recognize the claims of the Jewish refugees from Arab countries and seem to be prepared to do something about it ("Canadian Jews to join campaign for refugees from Arab lands," CJN, June 16).

It is sad, however, that this important issue lingered unheeded by our government, by the international Jewish community, by the State of Israel and by "the powers that be" at Canadian Jewish Congress for some 30 years.

Despite resolutions, sparked by the committees that I headed and passed at several national plenary sessions of the CJC, despite public lectures by spokespersons for WOJAC, both in Toronto and Montreal, despite countless meetings, that I had with a succession of federal ministers, and despite articles in your newspaper, nothing whatsoever was done over these three decades to advance the cause of our refugees, by any members of our government or the Canadian and international Jewish communities. By default, the only refugees recognized were those Arabs who left what was Palestine and then Israel, plus their children and grandchildren who have always lived in the inhospitable Arab countries in squalid camps. These countries meant to use them as pawns in the fight by the Arabs against the Jewish state.



Now, perhaps, with Canada recognizing this issue and being the "gavel" of the multilateral committee on refugees from the Middle East and a meaningful intervention from Jews across the world, the tragic deprivation of human rights, the torture and the dispossession of Jews who lived in Arab countries will finally be addressed in a meaningful way.

March of the Living 'flaws'

This is in response to Rabbi Dow Marmur's column of June 16 headlined "March distorts Poland's image." Clearly, no program is perfect, but to describe the matters raised by Rabbi Marmur as "flaws" is inaccurate. They are more precisely important issues that can be addressed through proper preparation and planning, and that is what we do. Our participants must commit to many hours of intensive study and discussion of the very issues raised by Rabbi Marmur, as well as many which he didn't raise. In this way, we minimize if not eliminate the potential negatives, so that the overall effect of the March is that it, as he puts it, "strengthens the participants' Jewish identity. The experience has brought many of them closer to Judaism and the Jewish people." Rabbi Marmur should take comfort from the fact that the Canadian March of the Living is, as he suggests it should, "showing the way."

Yiddish and Hebrew names

In the column "What's in a name?" by Rabbi Leigh Lerner (CJN, June 2), he implied, or perhaps I inferred, that Yiddish names are of lesser significance than Hebrew names: "We should all become conscious of our Hebrew names, not simply our Yiddish ones."

I immediately thought of the zaide (patriarch) of Hebrew/Yiddish literature, Sholom Jacob Abromowitsch. After 10 years of writing in Hebrew, he felt the need to write in the language of the Jews with whom he was most acquainted – the Jews of eastern Europe. Accordingly, he adopted the pen name "Mendele Moykher Sforim" (Mendele the Bookseller). While he continued to write in Hebrew, he began to write regularly in Yiddish.

This is only one example of a Yiddish name playing a significant role in the annals of Yiddish/Hebrew literary history.

A reader's congratulations

I'm sure that your readers, like myself, share and shep naches that The CJN has been named the best overall specialty newspaper for 2004 by the Quebec Community Newspapers Association.

This great news item on the front page ("CJN wins award," June 16) is worth repeating. In conferring the award, the QCNA said: "Apart from filling a niche in its community, this is a great newspaper. The news and features are top rate and the newspaper is full of interesting and well-written opinions. A great package."

It certainly is a great weekly welcome package! Heartiest congratulations and mazel tov to the entire staff!

On the 35th anniversary of the passing of Cecil Roth

By SHELOMO ALFASSA

As one of the greatest Jewish historians of the 20th century, Cecil Roth was much more inclined to read a stack of books, going through them at a voracious rate, than do anything else while growing up.

Roth's literary idol was Edward Gibbon, the famed 18th-century historian of world renown. Roth once said, "I would gladly give up all the work I have done in return for the ability to produce one paragraph, or even one sentence, in the style of Edward Gibbon." But Roth developed his own brilliant style, which remains a shining example of prose written by a man who felt enthusiastically and emotionally linked to his subject matter.

His style stood out on its own, one that is, sadly, rarely found in modern non-fiction prose. Many in the 19th and early 20th centuries valued non-fiction works, much the same as fictional prose is today regarded in contemporary society. It was a period when readers and writers valued wit and clarity of expression. Gentle mentions of current events would be sewn into the work for comparisons without taking away from the content or purpose, but yet adding a special intellectual flair to the subject matter.

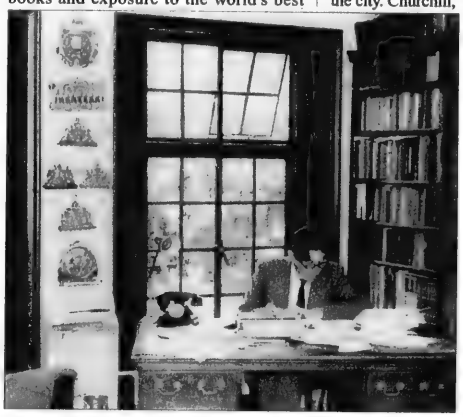
Roth was raised in England in a family that valued British proper manners and had an intense commitment to Jewish nationalism. Although the Roth family was descended from Reb Y.T. Roth of Poland, there existed a family tradition that they were descendant from Yossef Karo, the Sephardi author of the Shulchan Aruch, the code of Jewish Law. Roth, an observant Jew his whole life, adopted the Sephardi minhag, which he had learned in Florence, Italy.

He served in World War I in France and later would study at Merton College. As an observant Jew, Roth helped convince Oxford University, which was not overly receptive to matters regarding Jews, to allow Jewish students to take exams on Sundays instead of Saturdays. These Jews had to be sequestered so that they could not possibly learn what was on the exams, so many of them spent the time at the Roth home, a place popular among the students.

Until 1939, Roth had no permanent academic position and was thus free to travel the world, which he did extensively, writing at his leisure. He travelled to multiple continents, studying Jewish populations and becoming a desired visitor by many communities that hosted him. During this period, he developed quite a reputation as well as friendships that would last his lifetime.

In London, the Roth family played host to a who's who of Jewish and international society – personalities such as Angelo Sacerdoti, chief rabbi of Rome; Rabbi David Prato, chief rabbi of Alexandria; Nahum Goldmann, who would become the president of the World Zionist Organization; and Ehud Ben-Yehuda, who continued the pioneering work of his father Eliezer Ben-Yehuda (father of modern Hebrew language).

A historian with seven decades of experience, intimate with the rarest of Jewish books and exposure to the world's best minds, Roth was able to locate some of the most unique particulars of history. One of these involves Austria's Archduke Ferdinand. Roth said that before he was assassinated in an event that was said to have triggered World War I, Austria's archduke was travelling with his wife in Sarajevo on the way to the National Museum to view the Sarajevo Haggadah, a collection of Jewish scriptures written around 1314 in Spain and one of the most valuable books in the world.



Cecil Roth is at his desk in his home office in Oxford, circa 1940. The menorahs on the wall are now part of the Beth Tzedec Museum Collection.

Long before Hitler's name was commonplace in the newspapers of the world, Roth became concerned about the rising tide of Nazism in Germany, Which he felt would not retreat quickly. As early as 1933, Roth penned a letter of protest to the London Times against Hitler's declaration that he would boycott Jewish establishments. Roth wrote numerous articles and also developed books such as The Jewish Contribution to Civilization, which was written specifically because it had the potential to show the Germans and the world how the Jews have contributed greatly to society, and possibly have the side effect of mitigating maltreatment against the Jews. Many years after World War II, it was told that Roth obtained German documents – the plans to occupy London – plans that listed names and addresses of Jews. He was shocked to learn it was he who was at the top of the list, and that he would have been the first captured by the Nazis.

Cecil's tireless advocacy for the Jewish people is apparent in the remarkable story of the keys of Florence, which his wife told long after his death.

Upon the liberation of Florence, then-British prime minister Winston Churchill's office telephoned Roth who was in possession of the original and ancient keys to the city. Churchill, desiring to make a great impression upon his arrival in Florence as a victor, wanted to know if Roth, a fellow Brit, would allow him to return the keys during a ceremony with the mayor of Florence. Roth had a "shocked" reaction to this curious request. He told the office candidly: "Please tender my sincerest respects to Mr. Churchill... I realize the keys should be returned to Florence, and I have made arrangements that the keys will later go back to the city of their origin, but only when the time will be ripe. As things stand, I do not as yet feel disposed to give such a gift to a people who until so recently tolerated the anti-Semitic regime under which so many of my dear friends were liquidated."

Cecil Roth, circa 1935

Roth wrote on topics that included Italian Jewry, Sephardi experiences and important Jewish figures, and was an authority on both the Dead Sea Scrolls and Jewish art. He was a professor at Oxford from 1939 to 1964, and was a visiting professor at the New York schools, Yeshiva University and Queens College, splitting his time in later years between New York and Jerusalem. Roth became the mentor and teacher to many of the great Jewish scholars of the 20th century. His students included Haham Gaon, subsequently the Haham of the Spanish and Portuguese Congregation of London, the Haham of the World Sephardic Federation, and later professor of Sephardi studies at Yeshiva University.

In May 2005, Joseph Roth, Cecil's nephew, issued a new book, a collection of Roth's papers titled Opportunities That Pass. The book is a fabulous tribute to the gentle scholar, a passionate educator who touched so many.

In it, a poignant story is told by Joseph Roth about a discovery he made in his uncle's personal archives – a tiny white book with thin paper. The book, in Russian, turned out to be a translation of his uncle's History of the Jews. Researching where the book came from, Joseph found that a Russian émigré to Jerusalem had given it to his uncle's wife, thanking her for all of the knowledge he had gained reading it and rereading it. The small volume filled with the history of the Jewish people changed his life; he later moved to Israel and eventually became a lecturer at the Haifa Technion.

No one knows who printed the small pocket-sized volumes that covered Jewish history from ancient times to 1967. It is known that many were produced, and a report out of Russia once told how police went house to house to confiscate them. Roth would have been proud to know his work became a springboard back to Judaism for countless persons living under the tyranny of Russia.

He never lived to see his final and most significant project, the development of the massive Encyclopedia Judaica of which he was the editor. The first volume went to print the day after he passed away.

At age 71, on June 21, 1970, Roth died, leaving a legacy of more than 700 published papers, articles and books. He was buried in the Sanhedria Cemetery in Jerusalem.

Today, Roth's books are readily available in almost every library in the world, where they continue to educate and inspire a new generation.

In addition to being a prolific writer and teacher, Roth collected objects of Jewish historical interest from an early age. In the mid 1960's, when he retired to Israel, Beth Tzedec Congregation acquired his extensive and world-renowned collection of Judaica. The University of Leeds, England, received his books and manuscripts.

Today, the Cecil Roth Collection of ceremonial Judaica forms the core of the Beth Tzedec Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum. Part of the collection is now on view in the museum. Please call the museum curator, Dorion Liebgott, 416-781-3514, ext. 32, for more information.

Another long, hot summer?

Israel's planned departure from Gaza later this summer is providing pollsters and pundits from across the political spectrum with an abundance of copy and commentary.

But scratch the surface and you'll find relatively little substance to many of the analyses that are being touted as though they carry the imprimatur of thoughtful objectivity. In reality, the only agreement there seems to be is that there is no agreement – which is either disturbing or encouraging, depending on your perspective.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

For the doomsday set, predictions of a "third intifadah" – or merely a continuation of the second uprising – are widespread. According to this scenario, there is a high likelihood that the peace process, in whatever form it assumes, will stall after disengagement from Gaza is completed. Such an eventuality will likely fuel the unmet expectations of a majority of Palestinians and ignite fresh waves of suicide bombings that will demand a strong Israeli response. Blood will again flow, the blame game will again begin, and we might be back to the turmoil of just a few short years ago.

An alternative outcome is that the pullout from Gaza will be successful – with avoidance of civil strife from among the settlers and prevention of any major confrontations between Israelis and Palestinians. With this as a precursor, Israelis might expect that real advances be made toward the permanent cessation of hostilities and a more comprehensive resolution of the conflict. Palestinians, on the other hand, might look to substantive improvements in their living conditions, re-investment in their economy and some realization of statehood.

However, within the cauldron of Arab-Israeli relationships, and given the complexity of the evolving political landscapes on both sides, the second projection, even through the lens of an eternal optimist, would seem to be a long shot.

What we are therefore left with is the ominous spectre of the first scenario – or perhaps a less extreme version of it. Or there may be yet a further option, which is founded on the containment of violence while perceived gains on each side are consolidated.

Within the Israeli context, much will depend on whether Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is able to maintain his power base and how he plans to advance a peace initiative after the Gaza withdrawal. Even more will depend on PA President Mahmoud Abbas, who will need to control Palestinian extremists – such as Hamas – and reinforce his commitment to any reasonable peace negotiations that might emerge.

Volatility of temperament as much as of politics is a shared characteristic of Israelis and Palestinians, making predictability, even in the most ordinary of conditions, an inexact and exasperating construct. And as we approach yet another long, hot summer in the Middle East, conditions are anything but ordinary.

Uplifting words from an unlikely source

Every so often, for my own encouragement, I need to be inspired by the mysterious journeys undertaken by written words. Indeed, just a couple of weeks back, I was reminded of how one's own ideas and feelings, given concrete expression, can find their way into the hearts and minds of the most unexpected people.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

It was on the way over to the Machane Yehuda food market that I spotted Michael (not his real name) out of the corner of my eye as he neared the densely packed laneway to forage for his daily bread. The hour was late, not long before closing time, and the stall owners had begun setting out their over-ripe fruits and vegetables for the city's poor. Even at a distance, Michael's familiar hurried and harried gait, as though in relentless flight from some invisible demon, was unmistakable.

American by birth, Michael is one of the many homeless individuals who have come to populate the country's streets in increasing numbers in recent years. He can often be seen drifting aimlessly about our neighbourhood from one vacant perch to another, seated in a corner of the public park under a tree, or stretched out asleep on a bench. He owns but a single suit of clothing, which he refreshes with more recent acquisitions fished out of municipal refuse bins. And though our paths have crossed numerous times, our interchanges had, up until then at least, been limited to the occasional "Hello."

Now, catching sight of me across the street, he rushed over, positioning himself squarely and awkwardly in my path. I was forced to come to an abrupt halt.

"Hi there! Remember me?" he blurted out with effervescent enthusiasm.

"Sure," I said, somewhat unnerved by the sudden attention paid me by this near stranger.

"I just wanted to let you know," he went on, "that I saw you in print the other day. The pieče you wrote was absolutely wonderful!"

I was struck dumb. How in the world, I mused, could this indigent nomad of Jerusalem have permitted himself the extravagance of a foreign newspaper? And what were the chances it would be the Canadian Jewish News?

Then recalling that a local Christian charitable organization had extended him occasional assistance in his times of greatest need, I drew the most obvious conclusion. "Oh, you mean the one about Zechariah?" On account of its prophetic overtones, that particular column (Feb. 10, 2005) attracted interest in certain Christian Zionist circles. Perhaps they'd circulated it.

"No," Michael said, shaking his head. "No, it had nothing at all to do with Zechariah. I never read that one. I was referring to the piece on Auschwitz, about the old man and the candle [March 10, 2005]. I like to peruse [sic] the garbage bins and one morning, staring right up at me from down in the dark interior of a big one in the centre of town, from underneath a heap of trash, was your face. I recognized it right away! So I fetched it out, seated myself on the sidewalk and read it."

A few seconds of silence followed before he spoke again. "It was so very sad… and so moving. I actually cried you know."

Tears suddenly welled up in the eyes of this rootless, restless and homeless drifter who lives so far away and apart from the world and realities of Canada. The odyssey undertaken by my words – travelling across oceans and seas, only to find their way by return voyage to my own little corner of Jerusalem – was just short of amazing.

As I stood there stock-still, wondering in silence at this startling coincidence, Michael suddenly, and without warning, turned and scampered off. Just like that! The invisible demon had picked up his scent and was nipping at his heels.

But then, a few short paces away, as though feeling the urgent need to tend to some irksome, unfinished business prior to making his getaway, he mustered the necessary courage to scurry back.

Taking me into his embrace with outstretched arms, he pulled me tightly to his breast and whispered with heartfelt tenderness: "Please keep writing! It's so very, very important that you do so. More than you probably think."

Strategic lessons from the boycott fight

At the end of April, the governing council of Britain's Association of University Teachers, with more than 40,000 members, voted to boycott two of Israel's major universities – Bar-Ilan and Haifa. This was the culmination of a three-year campaign by a small group of obsessed and radical anti-Israel activists and the broader demonization of Israel that is prevalent in England, particularly on university campuses. After an initial effort to boycott all Israeli universities bogged down, and in what was to be the first stage of a process, Bar-Ilan and Haifa were singled out as being the most vulnerable.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

But this transparent strategy failed, Bar-Ilan and Haifa universities proved to be highly resilient, and a massive campaign reversed the outcome in less than six weeks. As a result, a new vote was called, and the boycott was rescinded by a large majority of the AUT council, without conditions. In the process, its promoters were widely ridiculed, with pictures of one of them, Susan Blackwell (a professor of English of little note at the University of Birmingham), wrapped in a Palestinian flag providing the dominant theme.

This was an important and rare victory in the political war designed to undermine the legitimacy of Israel, and its details, as well as its lessons, deserve careful attention.

First, the implications of this academic boycott were recognized – this was not a minor incident that would soon "blow over," but rather it was part of a concerted strategy and required a major effort to reverse the outcome. It was important to exact a high cost from those who supported the boycott, both actively and passively, in order to deter similar efforts in the future. In the process, the opponents threatened lawsuits against any academic engaging in a boycott, and were very active in writing letters and op-ed articles. For once, Israel's attackers, who have had the public relations arena largely to themselves for decades, were placed on the defensive.

This mobilization also highlighted the major ethical implications of the effort to violate free speech in pursuit of an ideological agenda. Bar-Ilan University's campaign for academic freedom emphasized that the open exchange of ideas and search for knowledge – without political, religious, or other boundaries – has been a central pillar of civilized society for centuries. The violation of this core principle in the pursuit of the anti-Israel obsession on many college campuses was correctly understood to be a danger that went far beyond the threat to Israel.

At the same time, it was also necessary to defeat efforts to justify an academic boycott by calling Israel the new "apartheid state," similar to South Africa, where various sanctions were employed. Indeed, the "apartheid" strategy against Israel, including the use of boycotts, was proclaimed in public at the UN's conference against racism, held in Durban, South Africa, in September 2001. This orgy of hatred was the result of the combined efforts of many non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and UN groups that exploit human rights and humanitarian claims to promote the destruction of Israel.

The Durban agenda – created by NGOs funded by the Ford Foundation, the governments of Canada (through CIDA) and Europe, and other sources – continues to promote a variety of anti-Israel boycotts. In the process, the heads of Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International, Christian Aid, etc., use their money and media access to paint highly distorted images of Israeli "human rights violations," and to promote boycotts. However, by directly confronting this great lie of Israel as a "racist state," rational people without an ideological chip on their shoulders were able to recognize the inherent immorality of this claim.

The success of this two-track strategy – combining the emphasis on academic freedom and the rejection of efforts to demonize Israel – is an important lesson for future battles in this deadly political war. Despite the difficult conditions, we have shown the ability to mobilize massively and quickly to defeat such efforts. Indeed, this political victory is no less important than any victory on the military battlefield.

The Kirshner File

Germany grapples with the radical right

Less than a week before the Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe was officially opened in Berlin early last month, a court in Munich sentenced Martin Wiese, a 23-year-old neo-Nazi, to seven years in prison for his role in a botched plot to bomb a new Jewish community centre in that Bavarian city.

Sheldon Kirshner in Berlin

Wiese, the ringleader of Southern Comrades, an obscure paramilitary group dedicated to overthrowing German democracy and replacing it with a Nazi-style dictatorship, intended to destroy the complex on Nov. 9, 2003, the 65th anniversary of Kristallnacht, during which thousands of Jewish businesses and synagogues were burned, 100 Jews killed and thousands more sent to concentration camps.

Arrested before he and his accomplices could carry out their plan, Wiese was a typical right-wing extremist, young and poorly educated. He reminded me of the mainly 20something neo-Nazis that I randomly interviewed in Berlin on May 8, the 60th anniversary of the Allied victory in World War II. Barred from marching past the Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe and the Brandenburg Gate, they were confined by the police to a fenced-in area near a major subway station.

At least half the neo-Nazis I approached categorically refused to speak. The ones who deigned to answer my questions were self-confident and assured. They expressed a certain nostalgia for the Third Reich. They talked about resurrecting Germany's pre-war borders. They voiced opposition to immigration and asylum seekers. They professed admiration for the segregationist policies of the old South Africa. They denounced the German government as undemocratic. They described Germany's defeat in 1945 not as a day of liberation from Nazi tyranny but as one of its blackest moments.

My interviews with them left me with the distinct impression that, though relatively small in numbers, neo-Nazis in Germany are extremely ideological and dedicated, and will risk public opprobrium and imprisonment in the interests of propagating their ideas.

There are some 170 radical right-wing organizations and associations in Germany today, with a membership of about 50,000 in a population of 83 million. Of these, upward of 3,000 are outright neo-Nazis, many from the eastern part of the country, where unemployment levels run high. They disseminate their views through publications, the Internet, nation-wide rallies and marches and pro-Nazi rock bands.

The philosophy they espouse is fixed by the notion that ethnic affiliation with a nation or race determines the value of a person. They reject the universal principle of equality, as specified in Germany's Basic Law. They call for an authoritarian political regime in which the state and the people join together in a volksgemeinschaft, Nazi terminology for a national community based on shared racial characteristics. They maintain that Germans are superior and must be protected from racially inferior foreigners and Jews.

And as in the Wiese case, they are addicted to violence. Last year, more than 10,000 criminal offences, including the display of Nazi symbols and the distribution of anti-Jewish materials, were classified as extreme right-wing motivated crimes.

The number of reported anti-Semitic incidents in 2004 rose to 1,346, up from 1,226 in 2003. Included in that figure were cemetery desecrations, such as an attack last summer on a Jewish cemetery in Dusseldorf during which 45 gravestones were vandalized. Figures for 2005 are not yet available, but consider this: A vandal scratched a swastika into one of the 2,711 slabs of the Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe within hours of its opening.

Paul Spiegel

In general, visible minorities, ranging from Turks to Vietnamese, are the chief victims of neo-Nazi violence, noted Georgios Tsapanos, a spokesperson for the federal ministry of the interior in Berlin.

With the advent of German reunification in 1990, there was an upsurge of racially-motivated violent crimes.

In 1991, neo-Nazi skinheads armed with clubs, rocks and Molotov cocktails attacked a building in Hoyerswerda housing asylum seekers. A year later, skinheads in Rostock torched a hostel where gypsies and Vietnamese guest workers lived.

Attacks on foreigners peaked in September 1992, when 536 incidents were recorded. In 1993, skinheads firebombed houses in Moln and Sollingen, killing a total of eight Turks.

And the list goes on.

The most important far-right political parties in Germany are the Nationaldemokratische Partei Deutschlands (National Democratic Party of Germany), the Deutsche Volksunion (German People's Union), or DVU, and Die Republikaner (The Republicans). None has managed to send representatives to the Bundestag, the federal parliament. But the National Democratic Party (NDP) has 12 seats in the state of Saxony, won in last year's regional election. The DVU holds six seats in Brandenburg and one in Bremen. The Republicans have been shut out of office for some years now.

The NDP was founded in 1964. Its membership stands at 5,000. For several years, the NDP's undisputed leader was Adolf von Thadden, who died in 1996. Forging impressive gains in the late 1960s, he was dubbed the "new fuhrer." In 2002, a Cologne daily newspaper claimed, in a sensational scoop, that he had been a British intelligence agent.

Of late, the NDP has been led by Udo Voigt, who raised eyebrows last year by praising Adolf Hitler as a "great German statesman" and branding contemporary Germany as an "illegitimate system."

In an interview, Tsapanos, of the interior ministry, described the NDP as thoroughly neo-Nazi. "It is racist and talks about German blood. It idealizes the Nazi party. And at closed-door rallies, they say Jews don't belong in Germany. The NDP, in public, has learned to cover up its anti-Semitism with anti-Zionism. But anti-Semitism is a cornerstone of its ideology."

Last January, 12 NDPers in Saxony's parliament walked out in protest after a moment of silence was declared to mark the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz. Shortly afterward, a court in Berlin convicted Claus Cremer, the deputy chair of the NDP in North Rhine-Westphalia, of incitement. Cremer was accused of taking a passage of the Talmud out of context by insinuating that Judaism endorses child abuse.

Germany has attempted to ban the NDP, but it has not succeeded for a variety of technical reasons.

The DVU, with 11,500 members, was established in 1987. A report issued by the Office for the Protection of the Constitution says the DVU "places special emphasis on xenophobia, anti-Semitism (and) anti-Americanism."

DVU leader Gerhard Frey has had links with Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel, who was recently deported to Germany from Canada. Frey is also editor of the National-Zeitung, which has the largest circulation of any extreme right-wing publication in Germany. It has reportedly published articles condemning German restitution payments to Holocaust survivors and asserting that Jews are disproportionately represented in politics, the economy and the media.

Martin Wiese

The Republicans, under the leadership of Rolf Schlierer, have a membership of approximately 8,000, and were founded in 1983. Like the NDP and DVU, they oppose the political status quo and dabble to varying degrees in xenophobia and anti-Semitism.

Tsapanos believes these parties theoretically stand a chance of winning seats in the Bundestag, since they possibly command the allegiance of about 15 per cent of the electorate.

To win more than five per cent of the vote and thus qualify for a Bundestag seat, however, they would have to elect charismatic leaders and convince voters the current political system is profoundly ineffectual. " No one knows whether these conditions can be met," noted Tsapanos.

Micha Brumlik, a Frankfurt professor who monitors the right-wing scene in Germany, agrees with Tsapanos that parties such as the NDP could break through the five per cent threshold by softening their platforms.

"If the NDP moderated its views, dropped its obsession with the Holocaust and turned more to the problems of the present, it would have a better chance for national representation," Brumlik said.

One of the gurus of the far right, NDP strategist Horst Mahler, was once a member of the far-left Red Army Faction. Nearly six months ago, he was sentenced to nine months in prison for handing out leaflets that said hatred of Jews is an "unmistakable sign of solid mental health."

The German government claims it is doing its best to watch and combat right-wing extremists. But the president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, Paul Spiegel, says Germany can do better.

Toronto doctor buoyed by Qatar conference

Co-chair of UJA Federation's Medical Services Division addresses Arab conference

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

Dr. Michael Gordon, vice-president of medical services at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and a professor of medicine at the University of Toronto was apprehensive about being invited to speak at two back-to-back conferences in Qatar.

Dr. Gordon, the co-chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Medical Services Division was concerned about being a Jew in an Arab nation, and reluctant to visit Qatar.

"My preconceived ideas about Qatar were dispelled upon my arrival at the conference and I began to feel quite comfortable," explained Gordon, a passionate Zionist. "Every where I could, in conversations with colleagues from other Middle Eastern countries I talked about Israel. With a Jordanian I talked about Eilat and how tourists crossed back and forth; with an Egyptian I talked about the equivalent thing and I found that Israel became a real connecting force."

Dr. Michael Gordon in Qatar with a spokesman for the Qatar Association for Retired Persons.

It was overwhelming to Gordon that his Arab colleagues, most of whom were Muslim openly accepted his Jewish heritage and his love of Israel. He was also surprised by the Westernization of many of the professionals he met, who were western in their dress and honest in their discussions of terrorism and Islam. In particular he was caught off guard when a Bahraini psychiatrist offered a blunt assessment of Palestinian terror in Israel.

"I was absolutely mesmerized by this physician, wearing traditional Gulf region dress," Gordon said. "He was speaking so candidly to me of the horror and futility of terrorism, the need for the Arab world to fight against it, to introduce democracy into its political infrastructure, and to stop looking backward but rather forward to succeed in the contemporary world. I left the conference thinking there is a real possibility for a future in this region."

Prime Minister Sharon meets Toronto mission participants

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

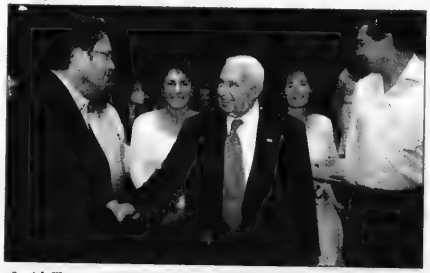
Forty of UJA Federation's leading supporters recently took part in a week-long Prime Minister's Mission to Israel, led by Campaign 2006 chairs Honey Sherman and Warren Kimel.

On the second day of the mission, participants met with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in a downtown Jerusalem hotel, just minutes after Sharon held an important summit meeting with Palestinian Authority President, Mahmoud Abbas.

"This entire mission has been so wonderful and so uplifting and, of course, the Israelis are heavily debating the pros and cons of disengagement," said Ariella Rohringer, mission participant, and co-chair of UJA Federation's Top Gifts Division, with Fred Waks. "The fact that Prime Minister Sharon took the time to meet with us on the day of his important summit with the Palestinians, was incredible. He was very charming and appeared very relaxed. He was an absolute delight."

While introducing Prime Minister Sharon to the group, Yossi Tanuri, Director General of UIA Federations Canada in Israel, thanked mission participants for their presence.

"We need you here, we always needed you but I think that now we need you more than ever," said Sharon.



Jewish Toronto Tomorrow Central Campus Steering Committee Chair Peter Cohen (l) was among 40 UJA Federation Prime Minister's Mission participants who meet with Israeli PM Ariel Sharon.

Perspective

A journey of sorrow and pride

By Mark Friedman

Toronto's Mark Friedman, 16, recently made the sojourn to Poland and Israel as a participant on the March of the Living. Toronto's March of the Living delegation was sponsored by UJA Federation.

I recently joined 100 other teenagers from Toronto on a journey that will surely change our lives. The March of the Living is a program that takes Jews to Poland in order to pay tribute to the six million Jewish lives that were lost in the Holocaust, and then later to Israel for Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's Independence Day.

The day of the March is a day that I will remember forever. Since all four of my grandparents are Holocaust survivors, I was not only proud of their survival but I felt a newfound appreciation for my own life. In this sense, I found vengeance in being able to walk freely and prove to the Nazis that they were not able to eradicate the Jewish people.

Mark Friedman places a plaque in remembrance of his eight relatives who were murdered in Auschwitz on the soil where their ashes lay.

As I placed a plaque in remembrance of my eight relatives who were murdered in Auschwitz on the soil where their ashes lay, I was able to identify individuals who survived the horrors, and not just their numbers. Since my relatives had no burial graves, I felt that by remembering them on the sight where they died, I would be able to ensure that they would not be forgotten.

During the trip, I took an oath to never forget the atrocities that happened during the Holocaust and to do my best to prevent such annihilations from taking place again. As I reflect on that one day during our journey, I hope I can act upon that oath and do my best to live up to it.

Historic flight leaves Toronto July 10th

This July 12th for the first time ever, over 200 Canadian olim will fill their own plane to Israel departing from Toronto. The flight represents a record number of Canadians starting new lives in Israel at one time. The Jewish Agency Aliyah Centre in Toronto, in conjunction with Nefesh b'Nefesh, a private organization that helps North American Jews make aliyah, has worked hard to organize this flight. To celebrate this historic event UJA Federation is co-sponsoring a community send off in honour of the many Torontonians making aliyah this summer.

Four hundred members of the community are expected to attend the celebration at the Leah Posluns Theatre on July 10th which will boast live entertainment from the Israeli Tsofim Caravan. Israel Consul General Kobi Brosh will be among those addressing the audience of extended family members and the olim themselves.

"I am amazed at the level of encouragement we are receiving from the community," said Joseph Bienenstock who is part of the Toronto aliyah group. "My wife and I have always had a great passion to live in Israel and this was the perfect window of opportunity for our family. The level of support from Nefesh b'Nefesh and the Aliyah centre has been enormous. It has been a huge help."

Over 150 individuals from Toronto alone will be making aliyah this summer and the numbers are expected to grow.

UJA Federation Campaign 2006

Focusing on youth at risk around the world

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

UJA Federation Campaign 2006, chaired by Warren Kimel and Honey Sherman, will be raising funds to assist young people at risk in Toronto, Israel and around the world.

The goal is to raise 10 million additional dollars within three years to create new opportunities for Jewish young people.

The Campaign 2006 action plan will concentrate on three areas:

- Social Justice - assisting Toronto's poor and vulnerable
- Re-building Israel - offering new opportunities to help relieve the impact of four years of terror.
- Helping Jewish youth return to Jewish life - Programs that will strengthen the attachment of Jewish young people to Israel and the Jewish community.

Among the initiatives that Campaign 2006 will help to fund are increased financial assistance for Toronto's Jewish poor, residential care and counseling at Israeli youth villages for disadvantaged young people who cannot live at home and expanded participation by Jewish university students in Israel action activities.

Honey Sherman and Warren Kimel, chairs of UJA Federation Campaign 2006.

"As Jews, it is our responsibility to help one another. As it says in the Torah, we are supposed to be there for each other," says Kimel. "And helping each other can come in many forms, including volunteering, and, of course, helping financially."

"We are at a crossroads both here in Toronto, in Israel, and abroad, and together we can make a difference," says Sherman. "We are committed to helping Israel's youth recover - socially and emotionally - from four years of terror. We are committed to helping our own next generation of young adults to solidify their participation in a life lead 'Jewishly'. And, finally, we are committed to social justice - caring for the poor and vulnerable here within our own community."

UJA initiative addresses special needs

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is undertaking a comprehensive initiative to raise awareness about and assist people with specials needs in the Jewish community. The initiative includes a recent conference sponsored by The Jewish Foundation's Professional Advisory Committee (PAC) about financial planning for individuals with disabilities.

The conference offered detailed descriptions of among other subjects estate planning for family members with special circumstances.

"Open communication is essential no matter what you do, what kind of plan you create," lawyer Mark Cohen explained. "Ask the person with the disability what he or she thinks if you can, discuss their needs and wants and also discuss the wishes of those individuals named and those they will be dealing with on an ongoing basis. Planning is better than not planning."

Stanley Kugelmas Chair of UJA Federation's Toronto Jewish Community Task Force on Inclusion.

UJA Federation's initiative also involves a task force on community inclusion for people with specials needs chaired by Stan Kugelmass. As a father of a child with special needs, Kugelmass speaks from personal experience.

"Our objective is to get UJA Federation to think about inclusion at all levels," he said. "We want people with disabilities to live full and rich lives in the Jewish community."

"Our second child who was born with limitations is vulnerable although competent." Kugelmass explained. "She had her bat mitzvah, she completed high school, she went on birthright israel and she is a counselor at camp which she adores. The role of our community is to make sure that when rights are given they are given to everyone."

A small endowment fund has been set up by the Jewish Foundation for people with disabilities.

A thirst for Israel

An estimated 15,000 community members took part in the UJA Federation Walk with Israel on May 29th, and apparently the 7km walk worked up the participants' thirst and appetite. An estimated 4,300 cold drinks were consumed helping to wash down 3,500 bags of potato chips and 3,800 hot dogs.

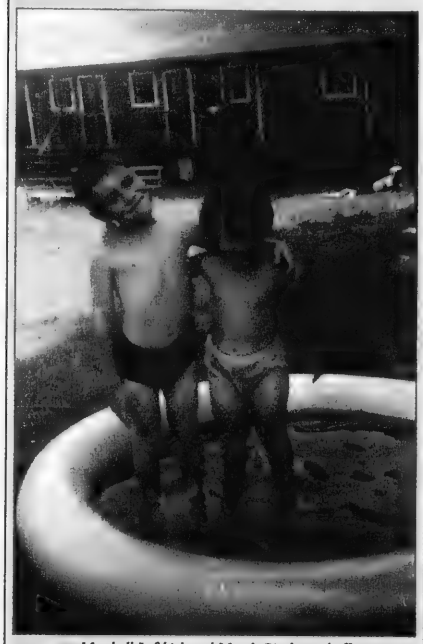
Hundreds expected to reunite at Pontypool

During the early to mid-20th century, Pontypool, Ontario - located 70 miles northeast of Toronto in the Kawartha Lakes region - was a thriving resort area that catered to Toronto's Jewish community.

During this period, Pontypool was the equivalent of the Catskills, providing first generation Jewish Canadians a reasonably priced family vacation. In addition to offering fresh air, a beach, recreational activities and kosher cooking, some of the resorts were able to draw famous personalities from the city such as the comedy team of Wayne & Shuster.



Marshall Lofchick and Mandy Pinsler cool off in a wading pool at the Lofchick resort.

In order to acknowledge the contribution that the resort and cottage industry made to the community, the Manvers Township Historical Society and Friends of the Pontypool Grain Elevator, will be holding a reunion on September 14 from 2 - 7pm. The event will be open to the families and their descendants who either owned resorts in Pontypool or vacationed there.

"We wanted to take this opportunity to honour those Jewish families who turned Pontypool into a resort," Doris Manetta, Vice president of the Manvers Historical Society explained. "The Jewish community of Pontypool helped with reforestation and was instrumental in boosting the economy. They were a real gift to the area."

The event will also mark the unveiling of an historic mural depicting a scene from the resorts. Everyone associated with the resorts is encouraged to bring and possibly donate photographs and mementos of their summers at Pontypool to the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Ontario Jewish Archives at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street. Copies of the photographs can be made for family members as well as the Historical Society.

If you are interested in attending the event, please RSVP by August 15, by calling The Ontario Jewish Archives at 416.635.2883 ext. 170 or e-mail oja1@ujafed.org

More questions than answers on road to 9/11

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The rise of Islamic fundamentalism, anti-Western attitudes, and the possibility of democratic reform in the Arab world were the subjects of The Road to 9/11, a one-hour documentary introduced by Danielle Smith on Global, June 17.

The documentary included interviews with a wide range of experts, and, drawing upon archival footage, covered a great deal of historic ground in an attempt to place the growth of Islamic extremism in a broad context.

The role that Islam itself plays was the subject of debate. Fareed Zakaria, editor of Newsweek International, said the problem is not "Islam as a whole" but rather "the Middle East and the Arab world in particular. This is not inherently a religious issue, which is therefore unanswerable, but a political and historical issue, which has very specific roots and causes, and can have specific cures."

Others saw a powerful religious component at the centre of extremist attitudes toward the West. Prominent Iraqi dissident Kanan Makiya remarked: "Islam stepped in where secular intelligence here failed. It provided the solutions. It became a very conservative force that pulled the Arab world back with them."

New York Times columnist and author Thomas L. Friedman said the United States' dependence on inexpensive Mideast oil has helped keep repressive Arab regimes in power: "For the last 50 years, we basically treated the Arab world as a series of just big gas stations. And all we cared was that you keep the pump open, the price low and be nice to the Jews and you can do whatever you want out back. You can treat your women however you want. Teach whatever you want in your schools."

Friedman appeared to be blaming U.S. foreign policy for the extremism in countries such as Saudi Arabia. But what about Syria, Algeria and, to a lesser extent, Egypt? These Arab countries that have little or no oil and are still repressive toward their people.

Friedman's claim that the Arab world was "nice to the Jews" is surely fatuous. If anything, anti-Semitic sentiment has risen sharply over the years. This constant anti-Israel and anti-Semitic propaganda conveniently deflects attention from the inherent failures of Arab autocrats.

As author and Princeton University professor Bernard Lewis explained, the Arab-Israeli conflict "provides the perfect safety valve. It is the licensed grievance. People [in the Arab world] are justifiably angry with their rulers and this is the one thing [over which] they can really let off steam."

But Fawaz Gerges of Sarah Lawrence College argued that westerners fail to appreciate "the depth of the grievances that the Palestinian conflict really plays in [the] Arab imagination. It's seen as part and parcel of the continuing onslaught of the West against Arabs and Muslims."

Zakaria raised the question of what the United States can do to help advance reform in Arab countries: "What America has to ask itself is, can it do something to get at the root cause of 9/11? And by root cause I don't mean poverty or something generic like that. I mean the frustration and political extremism that has developed in the Arab world. Can we help reform the Arab world? If we don't do that you're likely to see the same cesspool of stagnation from which [Al Qaeda leader] Osama bin Laden came. And if bin Laden is gotten rid of and Al Qaeda is destroyed, some other similar organization will come along."

The documentary certainly provided more questions than answers. It remains to be seen is whether substantial democratic reform is possible in a region where autocratic regimes and the repression of human rights have long been the norm.

'Anonymous unsung heroes' are most important people

But the most important people in a foreign correspondent's world, according to Kalman, are "fixers" – the "anonymous unsung heroes of Middle East reporting."

They're people such as bodyguards, drivers and interpreters – the "contacts who get reporters into places where journalists like to go."

Right now in Israel and the Palestinian areas, most fixers are Arab Israelis, since they speak both Arabic and Hebrew.

This is problematic, because "the Palestinians don't have a free press," said Kalman, who used the terms "Palestinian" and "Arab Israeli" interchangeably.

All three main daily Palestinian newspapers are controlled by the Palestinian Authority, and Palestinian reporters view their journalistic purpose differently than westerners do, he said.

While Western journalists strive to dig out the truth, Palestinians see their role as foot soldiers in a national struggle.

"We're not going to be seeing the whole picture if these are the people we use as our fixers," Kalman said. "The main problem is that reporters just don't know who to believe."

He related the story of a Danish journalist who went to Rafah after Israel bombed Palestinian houses on the Gaza-Egypt border that had been hiding underground smuggling tunnels. On finding an elderly Palestinian sitting on a carpet in front of a blown up house, the journalist was told the Israelis bombed so quickly that he wasn't even able to empty his fridge, and the full fridge was now buried under rubble.

The journalist and his cameraman began to dig through the debris to get a photo of this man next to his full fridge, only to retrieve it and find it empty. After questioning the old man, they realized the house wasn't even his.

"It took a journalist with 20 years' experience to literally dig up the truth," Kalman said. "We believe what we are told and why not? We are reporters, not detectives or forensic experts."

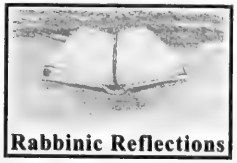
Korach: rebel without cause

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

Why should anyone be a second class citizen? This reasonable complaint is the argument made by Korach, a prominent Levite, who rebels against the leadership of Moses. He suggests that the Jews do not need his leadership, "for all the nation are holy, and God is among them, and why should you lord over the nation of God?"



Indeed, as the Midrash notes, Korach's complaint seems to be supported by the previous passage in the Torah. At the end of the previous Torah reading, the commandment of tzitzit, the fringed prayer shawl, is mentioned. As Jacob Milgrom (JPS Torah commentary, Numbers 15:37) points out, the tzitzit are similar to royal garments. They contain tchelet, a blue dye that was primarily used for royal garments (such as the uniform of the High Priest). In addition, fringes were attached to higher class garments. The Talmud (Gittin 53a) tells about an extremely wealthy man who lived in the first century, who was nicknamed "the one with fringes on pillows" because he was so wealthy that the fringes of his garments were carried on pillows by servants to prevent them from dragging on the floor.

Both the tchelet dye and the fringes on tzitzit indicate that they are a royal garment, worn by Jews because of their holiness. Tzitzit are an emblem of the Jewish people's exalted stature as a nation of priests, and their design would seem to substantiate Korach's complaint. So what was wrong with his argument?

Korach's mistake was that he forgot about responsibility. He assumed the special status granted Israel was a privilege, one that turns all Jews into royal princes, leaders who are purely autonomous, without any need to accept the direction of Moses.

However, if you refer back to the tzitzit, you will see that they are symbols of an exalted status that is based on service and responsibility. The Talmud (Menachot 43b) compares the tzitzit to a stamp made by slavemasters on the corners of their garments. This is quite an unusual interpretation for an otherwise regal garment. Yet this is precisely the message of tzitzit: "That you look upon them and remember all the commandments of God, and not follow your hearts and eyes which lead you astray."

What the tzitzit tell us is that even though Jews are given a royal garment in recognition of their holiness, it is a garment of responsibility, not privilege. Being one of the chosen people does not give Korach (or anyone else) the right to engage in self-centered or arrogant behaviour. It only makes one "chosen" for greater responsibility.

Korach's mistake is one which is repeated by many throughout history. Some see chosenness as an excuse for insular chauvinism and disregarding our responsibilities to the world. Others feel that they are the ultimate arbiters of what it means to be Jewish, and like Korach, don't want to hear about any of the demands made by Moses and the Torah. Both of these misunderstandings forget that greater responsibility is the foundation of what it means to be a holy nation and a chosen people.

Are we answering students' burning questions?

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

It's report card season, and while kids and their parents tally up the year, it seems appropriate to grade the people who teach them.

How are we faring?

This question is, on one level, impossible to assess. There are many kinds of schools and students, and often the results may not be seen for years. And there are many teachers who maintain my awe and admiration for their knowledge and ability to inspire. But there are certain warning flags that should cause all of us concerned about the Jewish future to stand up and take notice. The most obvious is the incredibly difficult financial strain that day school puts on parents, but that is clearly outside the teachers' domain. Perhaps even more disturbing, however, is what exactly students are receiving for this investment.

Recently, a colleague showed me a fascinating article written anonymously by a graduate of a yeshiva high school in New Jersey. He writes that, ironically, schools like his are the breeding ground of heresy. His rationale for this surprising assertion is simple yet powerful. While the level of secular studies in his school had continued to grow in relation to the increasing maturity and sophistication of the adolescent student, the limudei kodesh, he said, provided "the exact same elementary level of education they have been exposed to their whole lives. Teenagers begin to think, to challenge their previous assumptions and the conventions they've been taught. No source of Torah rises to meet these challenges, to answer the questions that begin to fester."

An anomalous experience? Overly alarmist? Perhaps. And no doubt, secular studies can become overly romanticized when one becomes disillusioned with a blat (page of) Gemara. But the notion that much in Jewish education today lacks the sophistication – and worse, the courage – to meet students' probing head on, without apologies or denial or obfuscation or demagoguery, strikes me as not too far off base.

Many students complain that they simply do not receive satisfaction when it comes to getting their more skeptical doubts about Judaism answered in a satisfying fashion, and that the real gut questions – the "Why do we do this?" and "Why is this?" – are frequently met with formulaic dronespeak or some oratorical flourish meant to hide an appalling lack of ability to actually engage the question.

Perhaps the most tragic thing is that the Torah is quite capable of standing up to these challenges and, at the very least, giving a powerful account of itself. Jewish tradition is not afraid. It is we, the contemporary carriers of that tradition, who often flee the kitchen when the heat of post-Enlightenment inquiry begins to singe our insecure base of knowledge.

The first law of the Jewish student's intellectual charter of rights is "Do not patronize me." That is, "Do not respond to my questions with the utterly predictable answers that you, the teacher, learned as a child, or by placing me on the defensive by insinuating that my questions are the result of a weakened faith or a diminished intellectual grasp of the sources."

For Socrates, "I don't know" was the cumulative answer of a lifetime, a thought that would do us all well in the hallways of Torah.

Jewish Life

A man of many identities

The Orientalist: Solving the Mystery of a Strange and Dangerous Life* by Tom Reiss, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Who was Lev Nissimbaum – also known as Essad Bey and Kurban Said? Who could tell? In his short, exciting, many-sided, turbulent life of 36 years, fact and fancy were hopelessly intertwined.

The author of this spell-binding biography spent five years of intensive investigation, trying to discover the truth about this fascinating, often bizarre, personality.

Lev was born in 1905 to an oil-rich Jewish family in the Baltic port city of Baku. The family, forced to flee the Bolsheviks following the revolution, embarked on a terrifying journey across Turkistan and Persia, territory that supplied Lev with rich literary material and the seeds of a new identity.

The glories of Constantinople, which Lev reached in 1921, put the finishing gloss on his newly created persona – soon to be presented to the world as Essad Bey. Tom Reiss writes, "He would not arrive in Europe as a stateless Jew from the east; he would come dressed in an Ottoman fez or, when he felt like it, as a Cossack."

Young Lev, attached to the romantic world of Islamic history and culture, converted to Islam in 1922. He viewed his new faith as an enlightened path, fostering ethnic diversity between conflicting ideologies.

It isn't widely remembered that in the 19th and early 20th centuries, many European Jews felt a strong identification with Islam. The Arabs were considered historical cousins. Benjamin Disraeli refers to them as "Jews on horseback."

In Berlin where he settled, Nissimbaum, a gifted writer, at a furious rate, turned out more then a dozen widely read books. The most enduring of them was Ali and Nino, a fervent love story set in Baku at the time of the Bolshevik revolution, involving a Christian girl and a Muslim boy and the progress of their relationship as they mature. For many years, readers wondered who was Kubin Said, its mysterious author?

Reiss writes, "Faced with both Communist and Nazi oppression, Lev survived by countering brute force with the power of imagination. He was simultaneously a Jew, an Oriental and a German, but he never inhabited any one of these identities to the exclusion of the others – all were products of a defiant mind that refused to be branded or categorized from the outside."

Lev married a pampered Jewish dilettante whose father was a wealthy Berlin shoe wholesaler, became Mussolini's official biographer and travelled throughout Europe and the United States, telling everyone he was a Muslim prince, sometimes sporting a turban and flowing robes, or fur hat, bandolier and dagger.

Finally, abandoned by his wife, fearful of the Nazis, he ended up in Italy, intermittently starving and, in the absence of medical treatment, slowly dying of a rare blood disease.

He had several opportunities to save himself by going to live with his millionaire in-laws in New York, but he passed them all up. Little wonder, for the compelling thing about him was, Reiss concludes, that "he believed he could invent his way in and out of anything."

The Orientalist would be regarded as an impressive achievement, even if the author had confined himself to presenting the biographical details of the subject's complicated and unusual life. But Reiss is also an erudite and informed guide to the cultural realms and geographical locations in which Nissimbaum sojourned. All in all, this work of mingled scholarship and tenacious sleuthing is an astonishing book.

The 17th Maccabiah Games

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Seventy-three years ago, a few hundred Jewish athletes met to compete in a unique sporting event in Palestine, the Maccabiah. Since then the event has become the premier sporting event for Jewish athletes – and even a showcase for future Olympic superstars. In addition to athletic excellence, the Maccabiah has also been associated with politics, controversy and tragedy. As Israel prepares to host this summer's 17th Maccabiah, we look at the Games past and present on the World Wide Web.

The first formal Maccabiah took place in Palestine in the 1930s, but Jews have participated in competitive sports events as far back as the 14th century in Weissenfeld and the 15th century in Rome. More recently, two Jewish gymnasts, Alex and Felix Flaton, won golden laurels for Germany at the first modern Olympic Games in Athens in 1896. Three decades later, at the 12th Zionist Congress in Carlsbad in 1927, the Maccabi World Union was created "to foster physical education, belief in the Jewish heritage and the Jewish nation, and to work actively for the rebuilding of our own country and for the preservation of our people." [www.maccabicanada.com/about/history/]

The first Maccabiah Games took place in Tel Aviv in 1932. The Games got off to a rousing start as Mayor Meir Dizengoff made an entrance into the stadium riding a white stallion. Those first Games welcomed 390 athletes from 18 countries. [http://tinyurl.com/9p567]

Here's a great piece of trivia from the second Maccabiah in 1935: "In defiance of the British government's strict limitations on aliyah, many competitors took advantage of their being in the Holy Land and decided to stay. Such was the decision of the entire Bulgarian delegation, which unanimously decided to make aliyah and shipped their musical instruments back to Bulgaria instead of themselves." [http://tinyurl.com/7olv5]

Over the years, the Games have attracted some talented though still unknown competitors. In 1965, an American swimmer named Mark Spitz won two gold medals in the pool. "The excitement of meeting Jewish athletes from around the world and sharing with them the universal spirit of sports competition was a matchless experience." [www.maccabiusa.com/quotes.htm]

In 1997, the Maccabiah hosted 5,500 athletes from 50 countries. But the 15th Maccabiah will always be remembered for the tragedy that caused loss of life and numerous injuries. Four members of the Australian delegation were killed and some 70 others injured when a footbridge collapsed as they walked over it to attend the opening ceremony. [http://tinyurl.com/ceenp]

Four of the five officials found guilty of negligence for the bridge collapse were sentenced to prison terms. But Australia's participation in that year's Maccabiah was in doubt until Israel agreed to pay $4 million in compensation to Sasha Elterman. The Australian tennis player had been near death after ingesting a poisonous fungus in the polluted waters of the Yarkon River. [http://tinyurl.com/7swsp]

The 16th Games in 2001 suffered from a different kind of problem. Israel was reeling from attacks, including the notorious suicide bombing of the Tel Aviv Dolphinarium. The number of confirmed Maccabiah participants was eroding, and a possible cancellation loomed. After last minute negotiations, shortened Games did go ahead, but with only 2,200 athletes from 46 countries. You can listen to a radio report with a Jerusalem Post reporter broadcast during those Games. [http://tinyurl.com/8cye3]

Some athletes appreciate the Maccabiah for the value its founders tried to instil. U.S. swimmer Lenny Krayzelburg won three gold medals in backstroke at the Sydney Olympics. Prior to the 16th Maccabiah in 1991, he made waves when he announced that he planned to skip that year's World Swimming Championships in Japan so that he could compete at the Maccabiah. [http://tinyurl.com/azejr] In addition, he said, he plans to work with Jewish and immigrant children. "I may be wrong, but there might be a perception that Jewish kids are not athletic. Maybe I can change that trend."

Well it seems that Krayzelburg really does like the Maccabiah! He's back this month as part of the U.S. delegation and honorary team captain. "I feel that since the 2001 Games, I have really become attached to the Maccabi movement." [www.maccabiusa.com/]

Immigration key to growth of Jewish community

came from the Former Soviet Union (FSU). The study notes that the influx of Jews from the FSU represents the largest wave of Jewish immigration from a single country or region since the first quarter of the 20th century.

The next most productive source of immigrants was Israel, with 4,480 newcomers, followed by the United States with 3,000, western Europe with 1,550 and South America with 985.

The report suggests that a major reason for the "slow" growth of the overall Canadian Jewish population has been the "significant" attrition of elderly. Between 1996 and 2001, there were approximately 15,000 deaths in the Canadian Jewish population. Add to that an unknown number of Jews who left the country.

During the same period, there were 21,000 births in the community.

It is "clear," the study warns, that births alone cannot counter the effect of population losses related to emigration and deaths.

The report stresses the importance of reaching out to newcomers and helping them integrate.

"As the situation for Jews throughout the world becomes increasingly precarious," it says, "the role of individual [Jewish] federations and their affiliated agencies remains vital to successful transitioning. To truly welcome and integrate newcomers, we must practice and encourage the promotion of cultural sensitivity among ourselves, our children and our community, and embrace the richness of each new group as it arrives."

Regardless of country of origin, the report says, there are three factors influencing the successful transition of immigrants: education, employment and integration.

And like most groups, immigrants are concerned about the well-being of their children. "In the case of Jewish immigrants, providing children with access to the Jewish school system serves to pave the way for immigrant families to become involved in other aspects of Jewish communal life."

The study confirms that Canadian Jewry is an immigrant community: Fully one-third of Jews in this country were born elsewhere, well above the overall national rate of 19.3 per cent. And whereas Jews comprise 1.2 per cent of Canada's total population, 2.1 per cent of all immigrants in this country are Jewish.

Given the Canadian Jewish birthrate of just over two children per family – barely above replacement levels – immigration continues to be crucial, especially in light of past studies showing an aging community and a shrinking Jewish workforce, said the study's co-author, Charles Shahar of Montreal.

It's equally important to integrate them quickly. "There has to be a concerted effort to make them more involved," Shahar told The CJN.

Montreal, whose Jewish population has declined, and Winnipeg, where the community has not grown significantly, especially stand to benefit from immigration, he added.

Toronto continues to be a magnet for immigrants. In the period 1990-2001, nearly 20,000 Jewish newcomers settled there. The next most popular destinations were Montreal (5,875), Vancouver (2,400), Ottawa (900), Calgary (840), Edmonton (530), Winnipeg (475) and Hamilton (170).

The report found that Jews born in Poland are the oldest immigrants, with a median age of 77. Those born in Israel are the youngest of any immigrant group, with a mean age of 32.7 years.

The study found that about one-fifth of Jewish immigrants rely on government benefits for at least a decade after arrival.

Among newcomers, those from the United States have the highest income, at nearly $36,000 a year. Those from the FSU are the poorest, with a median annual income of $20,000. The research shows that three-quarters of Jewish immigrants from the FSU earn under $40,000 a year, as do a large chunk (69 per cent) of those from Israel.

Nearly half of recent Jewish immigrants have a university degree, compared to 42.6 per cent of all immigrants, and 26.5 per cent of recent Jewish immigrants have a graduate degree, versus 17.7 per cent for all immigrants. Jewish newcomers are replenishing the Jewish workforce with a "highly skilled" workforce, the study notes.

A separate analysis contained in the study shows that just over 8,000 individuals born in the FSU came to Canada from Israel between 1996 and 2001.

In a look at their Jewish identity, the analysis found that 65 per cent of this group identified themselves as Jewish (according to the criteria the census employs); nearly 17 per cent had no religious affiliation and did not consider themselves ethnically Jewish; and just over 18 per cent said they had another religion.

While two-thirds of this group consider themselves to be Jewish, "it is clear that some of the immigrants from the FSU who come here through Israel have tenuous roots to Judaism, and some are in fact married to Jews and are not Jews themselves," the study states.

It is "interesting," the report adds, that there are significant regional differences in the percentage of former Soviets from Israel who self-identify as Jews. For example, 73 per cent in Toronto said they were Jewish, versus 54.5 per cent in Vancouver and 40 per cent in Montreal.

Jewish communities in Vancouver and Montreal "have particular challenges ahead in terms of integrating these immigrants from the FSU and making them feel part of the fold."

Overall, the report shows that 27,790 Jews in Canada were born in the FSU. Of the USSR's 15 former republics, Russia has led the way as a source of immigrants, with 12,365, followed by Ukraine with 7,115, Belarus (1,375), Kazakhstan (180) and Georgia (65).

Long considered a sore point, at least among Israeli officials, is the fact that there are 13,545 Jews in this country who were born in Israel. Toronto is home to the largest number of Israeli-born Jews, at just over 8,000. There are also significant numbers of Israelis in Montreal (3,150), Greater Vancouver (840) and Ottawa (305).

By far the largest number of Jews from the FSU are found in Ontario (20,625 – two-thirds of these in Toronto), while the largest number of Jews from Morocco live in Quebec (7,295).

Toronto is also home to 6,425 Jews born in the United States.

Catholic school students display Holocaust art

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

An art display called "Drawings of the Holocaust" that features hand-sketched portraits by students from Cardinal Newman Catholic Secondary School was launched at Beth Tzedec Congregation last week.

Michele Root, a Cardinal Newman art teacher, and Audrey Ferrer, a religion teacher at the school, were two of nine educators who were fully sponsored by Canadian Society for Yad Vashem to attend an annual teachers seminar at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem in January.

"We wanted to do something right away once we got back from Yad Vashem. We were quite keen to share something with the school then," said Root, the driving force behind this exhibit, which features art by students from grades 9 to 12.

The assignment was for each student to find an archival photograph from the Holocaust and duplicate it as a pencil drawing.

Root said the art, produced by students as young as 14, was not the product of raw talent, but hard work and long hours. She said her students took the assignment very seriously, which is what led to such detailed, meticulous pictures.

"My students are quite ordinary students. I didn't know what I might get from them, but I asked them to do the best drawing they have ever done. I told them I wanted it to look like a photocopy," she said.

Although the Catholic school holds a school-wide assembly every November for Holocaust remembrance, Root and Ferrer wanted to do something for Yom Hashoah this past May, and they felt the art display would be the best way to engage the most students.

"I thought, let's have something for Yom Hashoah and we can invite the religion and history classes to research the photographs, respond to them, see what they do with the images," Root said.

"We had the art display put up and [the students] would go very quietly through it. We had the artists light six candles for the six million at the end of the day."

Root managed to engage her art students in the 15-hour project by making the horrors of the Holocaust relevant to today, as opposed to regarding the Shoah as an isolated incident that occurred 60 years ago.

"There was an article and a photograph in, I believe, The Toronto Star, and it was really frightening. It showed swastikas at an Italian soccer match.

"I told them, 'You know we had an assembly in November. You know I went to study at Yad Vashem. Look what was in the paper last week.' And their mouths dropped."

Ferrer said the assignment has spurred some students to take their knowledge of the Holocaust further.

"One student in particular wants to research the photos even more, and he would like to, as part of [Cardinal Newman's] co-op program next year, to travel with the photos and become a resource person to answer questions."

Some students even created bulletin boards to inform people about anti-Semitism.

"They really are more aware that anti-Semitism is still present and it is not just something that happened a long time ago. They know we have to be wary," Ferrer said.

The art display, which was sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, runs until July 6 at Beth Tzedec.

Anti-Semitism cited as a major reason for move

"One day we sat and had lunch together, just the women," Halpert added. "So we just discussed where everyone was at, what we were worrying about, what stupid stove to buy, but it all has to be done."

While they said that tying up all the loose ends before the big move has been overwhelming, they both agreed that the help from Dina Gidron, the regional director of the Aliyah Centre, has made the process less daunting.

Halpert described what typically happens when a family visits the centre to inquire about the process of moving to Israel.

"You have a meeting with Dina and you'll talk about where you want to go, what you want to do, about work, and she steers you to a community that might be suitable."

With Gidron's help, Sherman and her family decided to move to a suburb 10 minutes south of Jerusalem, while the Halperts, with their four boys, will move to a gated community called Hashmonaim.

Both women cited many reasons for wanting to move to Israel, but the main reason was the indescribable connection they felt to the land.

"My husband and I have always wanted to [make aliyah]. We went on a trip two years ago [to Israel] and that's when it clinched the deal," Sherman said.

"My kids were so happy there, and we just thought that we can't really deprive them of this. We started making plans a couple years ago to investigate and take the plunge."

While Halpert was not the driving force in her family behind the move, she also said that she couldn't deprive her husband and children of the connection they have to the Jewish state.

"My husband has always felt very connected. Whenever he goes, he comes back and says his soul is not alive here. He just feels empty and wants so badly to be there.

"We went on holiday two years ago and I saw how happy the kids were, and despite all the security issues, we just felt so comfortable."

Both Halpert and Sherman also cited a rise in anti-Semitism as a reason for wanting to leave Toronto.

"We definitely felt it as a family," Sherman said. "My kids had a few incidents, like being called names in the streets. When they were riding bumper cars [they were targeted and] were told, 'Die Jew.' My kids wear kippahs and are visibly Jewish."

Halpert, whose family is also observant, recalled how Jewish tombstones were toppled and anti-Semitic messages were spray-painted on Jewish schools and synagogues last year.

"It was really visible to my kids, and they were really upset by it."

Although anti-Semitism in Toronto was a major concern, Sherman stressed that she and her family are not running away.

"This is a real aliyah of choice. We're choosing a lifestyle. We work and our kids have vacation during Pesach and Sukkot and I end up having to juggle babysitters, figure things out and send my kids to their grandparents.

"But in Israel, we're living in a Jewish country, so we're all going to be off on Pesach and Sukkot. Little things like that – that the country's holidays are our holidays – [is why we're going]."

It may not be easy to start fresh in a foreign country, but saying goodbye to their home won't be easy, either.

"We're tearing away from the community here. We're leaving a great life. But the intention is to get a better life," Sherman said.

Queen's Hillel member heads student government

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

He's smart, popular and outgoing – and he was the first non-Jewish member of the Queen's University Hillel executive committee.

Now Ethan Rabidoux is president of the Alma Mater Society (AMS), Queen's student government.

The fourth year politics major and drama minor says he is motivated to make a real difference in the lives of the 13,500 Queen's students, particularly in the area of improving external university student housing standards.

"I bring with me an attitude and desire to change aspects of the university and to make it better," he says.

After holding various other positions, such as student senator and arts and science student representative at faculty and AMS meetings, Rabidoux said the AMS presidency was the next logical step.

But in addition to his other positions, Rabidoux was also a student director on the Queen's Hillel governing council from September 2004 to January 2005.

As unusual as it is to have a non-Jew on the Hillel executive, Rabidoux made his presence felt.

Rabidoux became involved with Hillel through the Queen's Israel Peace Initiative, a pro-Israel campus group he joined in 2002 after reading about the Arab-Israeli conflict and finding that he supported the Israeli position.

He joined the Hillel executive last fall and immediately started organizing debates and participating in various other pro-Israel lobbying activities.

When he chose to run for AMS president and had to take a leave of absence from Hillel (as is required by AMS policy to ensure no conflicts of interest), a number of Hillel members joined his campaign, including Josh Kertzer, who became one of his campaign managers. Hillel also endorsed Rabidoux's campaign.

Outgoing Queen's Hillel president Sara Berger said Rabidoux was involved in Hillel for so long that when he decided to run for student council president, she and other Hillel members naturally supported him and worked on his campaign.

Ethan Rabidoux

The AMS presidency carries with it a great deal of responsibility, including being accountable for an $8.7 million budget.

Directly under Rabidoux are his communications officer, a vice-president of university government and a vice-president of operations.

Each of the vice-presidents, in turn, have their own area to run. The vice-president of university government is responsible for five commissions and 1,000 volunteers, while under the operations banner are three directors and 14 AMS services.

The Queen's AMS is the oldest student body in the country, having been established in 1898.

Rabidoux said he chose to run for president in order to give something back to Queen's, which he said has given him so much and has helped him to become a more rounded person thanks to its openness in dealing with a vast number of issues.

Mentioning the Israeli-Palestinian conflict specifically, he said Queen's has a history of dealing with the conflict in a very open and unbiased manner.

"They have never having taken a position on either side and have always allowed freedom of speech on both sides," he said.

Describing Rabidoux as "one of the boys," Queen's Hillel director Stu Woolley said he was "the natural choice for AMS president in every dimension."

Woolley told The CJN that Rabidoux is a "strong package" because he is "super easy to be around" and makes everyone feel comfortable.

Harris family donates $5 million to York U

A new research initiative at York University will build on new knowledge of the brain's development to help set children, including those with developmental disorders, on the path toward emotional and intellectual health.

York's Milton and Ethel Harris Research Initiative (MEHRI) is the first of its kind in Canada and uses a pioneering intervention approach known as DIR – or individual-difference relationship-based therapy.

The $5-million gift, made through the York University Foundation, is the single largest private research gift in York's history. Milton Harris, who died earlier this year, was president of Canadian Jewish Congress in the mid-1980s.

"This research initiative will allow us to deepen our understanding of how the minds of children develop," says Stuart Shanker, a professor of psychology and philosophy in York's Atkinson faculty of liberal and professional studies who will lead the initiative.

"An alarming number of children in our society currently suffer from developmental, learning, mental health or social disorders, and their numbers are growing. Ultimately, our goal is to benefit all children."

Education key to treating diabetes

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The most important person on the team treating diabetes is the patient, says Ian Blumer.

Blumer is a doctor with a Durham Region practice specializing in the treatment of diabetes, and a medical associate at Mount Sinai Hospital.

He was speaking at a recent meeting of the Jewish Diabetes chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association, held at Shaarei Shomayim congregation.

To thrive, and not just to survive the condition, Blumer said you have to look after yourself. And to do that, you have to know what should be done to treat the disease, and insist that it is.

This is one of the reasons, Blumer said, that he considers diabetes education to be the single greatest advance ever made in the disease's treatment.

The dangers of diabetes are serious, he said. "Diabetics are at high risk of cardiovascular disease, including stroke and heart attack, blindness, kidney disease and amputation."

Blumer considers the incidence of diabetes to be an epidemic. "Seven per cent of the population of Canada have it. In Metro Toronto alone, there are enough [diabetics] to fill the Rogers Centre six times."

However, Blumer said, 70 per cent of complications are avoidable.

On the day of diagnosis, he said, 50 per cent already have complications. These can often be stopped, at least slowed down, or even reversed, provided there is proper medical care.

The care team is not just the doctor, he said. The doctor is often so overwhelmed by the amount of literature that there is and the number of patients he or she is responsible for, that he can't either stay current or treat patients as well as he would like to. Rather, the team includes the nurse, diabetes educator, endocrinologist, pharmacist, dietitian and podiatrist, as well as family and friends.

In his often hilarious talk, Blumer stressed several points. If it is your birthday and you have a piece of cake – or even three pieces of cake – forget about it. "No one ever died from three pieces of cake. Don't feel guilty – get over it," he advised.

Eat properly, he said. "Meet with a dietitian, and don't leave her office with a diet that is unrealistic for you."

While many diabetics need to lose weight, they shouldn't be daunted by the amount they need to lose. "Even losing a small amount, say five per cent of your body weight over the next 12 months, will lower sugar, improve cholesterol levels, make you more energetic and improve your well-being," he said.

It is essential to change a passive lifestyle into an active one. While walking is usually considered the best exercise, Blumer said, "the best exercise is one you like doing and will continue to do."

Blumer recommended weightlifting, and not necessarily at a gym. "While you are watching TV, take a can in each hand and do arm lifts for 20 minutes. Start with small cans and go on to bigger ones."

One of the most serious side effects of diabetes is eye damage, Blumer said. "On the day of diagnosis, 30 per cent already have some eye damage." If it is caught early, he said, it is usually treatable – if it is not treated, you could go blind.

Diabetics should see their ophthalmologist once a year if there is no damage, more often if there is, he said, adding that OHIP covers extra eye appointments for diabetics.

There is now a blood test, albumin creatinine ratio (ACR), which detects early kidney damage, Blumer said, although many doctors don't know about it. Insist on having it, he advised, and demand to know the results. "Ten years ago, there wasn't anything you could do about it. Now, it can be controlled by ensuring adequate blood glucose levels, and by taking ace inhibitor drugs, such as benazepril (Lotensin) or ramipril (Altace)."

The feet warrant extra attention. "Little sores should be treated as seriously as a heart attack." Blumer said. Check for calluses, numbness or tingling of your feet. Many diabetics lose feeling in their feet, and they may not be aware of wounds until they become infected.

Heart disease is the number 1 cause of death in those with diabetes, so special care must be taken to lower blood pressure to no more than 130/80; keep LDL, the dangerous cholesterol, under 2.5; take small doses of Aspirin every day; and ask your doctor about the statin drugs, such as Lipitor, Pravachol and Zocor, which lower the risk of heart attack by 30 per cent.

He also warned against allowing blood glucose levels to rise too high. "The latest target rates are four to seven before meals and five to 10 two hours afterwards, with seven being optimum. If your blood glucose level is eight instead of seven, you have a 40 per cent greater chance of blindness."

If diet alone doesn't lower the levels, ask your doctor for effective drugs, he advised.

Don't look at medicines as an anchor for the weak, Blumer said. "See them as a lifesaver."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am curious to know what you think the emerging food trends are.

A. I am glad you asked. Fortunately, the low-carb craze seems to be slowing down, and I believe that the emerging trend will include whole grains, healthy carbs and complex carbohydrates. I think that people are finally willing to accept that we need carbs, but good ones, ones that are healthy and high in fibre. These foods fill us up and prevent disease, but like all foods, need to be eaten in moderation.

You will also see a continued increase in natural and organic foods, foods that are less processed and contain fewer chemicals. Keep an eye on the ingredients' lists of all the products in which trans fat has been removed. Some manufacturers are replacing trans fat with other bad fats such as lard or sugars like high-fructose corn syrup.

Q. I am a busy mom. I am often in my car in the late afternoon, and get hungry. Can you suggest a portable nutritious snack?

A. I think the best mid-afternoon snack, one that is nutritious and portable, is a handful of nuts. But eat no more than 20 pieces because they are high in fat – but heart healthy fat – and calories. Almonds or walnuts are best, along with a piece of fruit or a yogurt. Another great addition to the nuts is tomato juice or V8, which unlike fruit juice is low in calories, as well as being healthy and filling.

Q. My teenage daughter suffers from migraines and I know that some foods can bring them on. What foods are these?

A. The trigger foods can vary among people, but the common culprits are cheese, nuts, chocolate, citrus fruit, processed meats, fried foods and foods that contain monosodium glutamate (MSG) and nitrates, such as deli meats and hot dogs.

הרפואה -ישראל לעומת קנדה

בואו נסתכל על מצב הרפואה:

אם המצב כל כך קשה-אז איך זה שתוחלת החיים בישראל היא בין הגבוהות בעולם ותמותת התינוקות בין התמוכות בעולם? אלה הם המדדים הכי חזקים לבריאות הציבור.

בישראל, גם אם אתה נמצא באמצע הנגב-במקרה של התקף לב תוך שעה תהיה בבית החולים של באר שבע או אילת.

בקנדה-מלינוי אנשים ניגעו אחרי שמונה שעות נסיעה לתחנת בריאות שמאויישת באחות.

או הינה כמה דוגמאות אישיות:

מצלצלת אלי אם מישראל שלבן שלה יש תופעות מדאיגות. חמשפחה גרה במרכז הארץ, אך לא באמצע תל אביב. אחרי מספר ימים חלה חטבה ספונטאנית בסימפטומים, ואם שואלת אותי אם כדאי שיעשו את בדיקת ה MRI שתוכננה לילד. זוהי בדיקה יקרה ומדוייקת מאוד שתחליפה את הרנטגן, ופה בקנדה מחכים אנשים בתור לבדיקה הזו חודשים רבים. אני ענה לאם שחבל להפסיד את התור, וממילא -אין סיכון בבדיקה. ענה לי האם בביטול וכלאחר יד: "אין שום בעייה-אני יכולה לקבל תור חדש תוך כמה ימים".

דוגמא נוספת: בקנדה חולכות אימהות לרופא ילדים או לרופא משפחה לתת לתינוק חיסונים. בארץ עושה זאת אחות טיפת חלב, שגם ברדקת איך מתנחלת החנקה, מבקרת בבית לראות אם התנאים סבירים ומשוחחת עם האם על כל בעייה שמטרידה אותה. אם האחות מוחה בעיות, ולו הקלות ביותר-היא מפנה לרופא. כך יוצא שרופא הילדים הישראלי מתרכז בילדים חבעייתיים שבאמת זקוקים לו, ופה רואה הרופא אלפי ילדים בריאים שלא זקוקים לו, ולא אחת מחמיץ את הילד שצריך אותו באמת.

אפשר לצחוק על זה, אבל בשיא הרצינות-פציינטים שיחדעים מה קורה מסביבם הם אלה שמגיעים לפתרונות יותר טובים.

והכל לפי הסיפור הידוע של שתי נשים בגיל מתקדם שנפגשות כל יום בחדר ההמתנה של הרופא. יום אחד-אחת מהן נעדרת. מצלצלת אליה השניה בדאגה לשאול מדוע לא הופיעה. אומרת לה הנעדרת: " לא יכולתי לבוא כי אני חולה חיום".

אבל שישאר בינינו.

על צירוף מקרים

אישה נכנסת לבר בבנימינה ומזמינה משקה קל. ניכר עליה שהיא שמחה ובאה לחגוג משהו טוב. בשולחן הסמוך יושב מָר רחוק שלא ראתה זמן רב, וגם הוא שתה שמח וטוב לב. שואלת אותו האישה מה הוא חוגג והוא מספר לה שאחרי חמש שנים שלא בקעו אפרוחים בְלול התרנגולות שלו-סוף סוף בקעו החודש מאת אפרוחים. אומרת לו האישה: "איזה צירוף מקרים! אחרי שמונה שנים של נסיונות סוף סוף הצלחתי להיכנס להריון".

אחרי שתי דקות של שתיקה שואלת אותו האישה: " מעניין, מה בדיוק שיעניק כדי שיוולדו אפרוחים בלול שלך?"

עונה לה האיש: "פשוט מאוד: חחלפתי את התרנגול...."

מסמיקה האשה עד שורשי שערה ומְמַלְמֶלת: "איזה צירוף מקרים".....

Max Gold celebrates his 100th birthday

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Max Gold celebrated his 100th birthday on June 11.

At the recent Sons of Jacob Shalom Lodge's general meeting, Gold was honoured. His family and friends celebrated his 100-year milestone with an open house at the home of his daughter, Gloria de Hond, in Thornhill.

Gold's father, Shia Shalom (Zushie) Gold, was one of the early members of the Sons of Jacob. Max has been a member for more than 50 years. He says the organization was founded to provide cemetery privileges for its members and for social purposes. It also raises money for charity.

"The Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda shul was first conceived in my father's store, Gold and Gold Tailors in the Bloor and Dovercourt area," says Gold.

Born in New York City in 1905, Gold was one of five children. His parents came from Minsk, Russia, at the turn of the century. The family lived at 105 St. Patrick St. in the Dundas and University area in Toronto.

"The city has grown amazingly," says Gold. "I remember when University Avenue was a dirt road. At that time, I would go with my friend on a horse and buggy, and for three cents, we could take a streetcar to High Park."

He says that when he was a child, the Spadina streetcar only went as far north as Bloor Street. "There was a coal stove in the middle of the car and at Bloor Street the conductor went to the back of the car, which became the front. We were frozen and that was a modern streetcar."

Max Gold holds a citation he received from the Sons of Jacob Lodge. Gold has been a member for more than 50 years. From left are Cherry Cohan, Max's wife Helen Gold, Harold Cohan, Jack de Hond, Sheili Stummer holding Max Stummer, Rachel Stummer, Shonna Stummer and Gloria de Hond.

Gold learned to dance as a teenager. "We would get together at someone's house to dance because except for the YMHA on Brunswick Avenue at College Street, there were few clubs, and the big social clubs did not want to have anything to do with Jews," he says.

He belonged to the Workmen's Circle and recalls when they held meetings at Queen's Park "and the police would come on their horses and chase us away."

Gold attended Harbord Collegiate and night school at Central Technical School (then called Toronto Technical), where he received certification in aeromechanics.

He worked as an auto mechanic and moved to New York, where he learned the needle trade in his cousin's business.

Returning to Toronto in 1932, he married Esther Silverman and continued working in ladieswear. He became a manager, a position he held until his retirement when he went to help his brother, Ben, who owned Gold's Drugs at Dundas and Bathurst streets.

The Golds had two children, Gloria and Marty, who passed away 10 years ago. After being widowed for 14 years, in 1981, Gold married Helen Smith.

Gold's daughter, Gloria de Hond, says her father is hard of hearing, "but he really is on the ball. He even reminds me of my appointments."

She says she would go to her father and "ask him a question on any topic He had the answers to all of them. He even explained to me the workings of a car, so I could understand it.

"He was very wise. At 85, he bought a new Chrysler and drove it until he was well into his 90s."

Gold adds, "I don't wear glasses and I never had an accident, but I decided that it was time to stop driving."

He and Helen live in the recently opened Valleyview Residence. At the residence, he participates in exercise classes, plays bingo and attends music sessions. "I do whatever I can do, and we attend the Shabbat shalom programs."

Helen says that her husband "gets particular joy from Gloria, who volunteers at Valleyview and other places as a clown using the name Glori Be." De Hond is a professional clown who performs at birthday parties and other events and belongs to Toronto Clown Ally. "She is amazing and makes a lot of people very happy," Helen adds.

Gold says that looking back he can't believe that he is 100. "I went to school, got married, had children – time goes by and before you know it, you are old."

Ottawa federation honours Tamir Foundation

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Tamir Foundation has received the Jewish Federation of Ottawa's first annual excellence in service award.

Founded in 1980, the Tamir Foundation promotes quality of life, in a Jewish environment, for persons who are developmentally challenged. The award comes with a $10,000 allocation to support the foundation's work.

Since its inception, Tamir has grown tremendously in size and scope of services offered. Its first small group home opened in 1985. There are now three group homes, including two brand-new homes side by side that have recently opened. In addition, Tamir offers assistance to those in their own homes, as well as a variety of day programs and outreach services.

The Judaic Outreach Program, developed by Tamir under the leadership of Cantor Daniel Benlolo and director Leah Smith, has provided opportunities for the participants to live fully Jewish lives. There have been bar and bat mitzvahs; Jewish holidays are celebrated together; Shabbat dinners are held on a regular basis; and an ever-growing list of weekly study and interest programs are held.

Mark Palmer, Tamir's executive director, said the foundation is "recognized among Jewish developmental service organizations as a leader in the area of Judaic programming" for developmentally challenged Jews.

Allan Moscovitch, chair of the federation's allocations committee, which chose Tamir for the award, said the committee was "particularly impressed with their consistent record of introducing and extending innovative services to what had been an underserved group of people."

Outgoing chair of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa (formerly the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'ir) Arnie Vered said that "it is so fitting that Tamir be selected the Jewish community of Ottawa's first recipient of the award of excellence. When it comes to best practices, Tamir leads the way."

Palmer said that one of the ways it does that "is by staying within its budget, while still managing to grow. The combination of having our internal house in order and determining the needs in the community keeps us strong."

Although Tamir is funded mainly by the Ontario Ministry of Community, Family and Children's Services, the residential outreach program receives no government funding. "We have not run a deficit because we know how to control costs," said Palmer.

He credits the government as well as the Jewish community for allowing Tamir to constantly pursue more and better programming. "We thank the Jewish Federation of Ottawa for its support over the years and for its leadership among federations in support of Jews with disabilities."

Always striving for the highest standards of care and service, Tamir has also taken the initiative in setting its own standards. "Developmental services in Ontario have no accrediting body, so we have set our own compliance standards. That is innovative in organizational development," said Palmer.

Vered noted that "Tamir is highly regarded within the Jewish community of Ottawa for its important work, but more so highly regarded by the general community of Ottawa in its field of care.

"This is something we all can be proud of. Tamir extends its reach wherever it can in order to help those who have a hard time helping themselves."

Opponents 'scare-mongering' over gay marriage, says Cotler

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Federal Justice Minister Irwin Cotler said continued perceptions that faith groups will somehow be compelled to perform same-sex marriages come from "a lot of scare-mongering."

"I think unfortunately there's been a lot of [it] going on," he told reporters in his riding office in Cote des Neiges.

Cotler, speaking not long after same-sex marriage legislation – Bill C-38 – passed second reading in the House of Commons, said the bill is "one of the most studied pieces of legislation ever."

He recognized that the legislation is "understandably still a divisive issue," but he noted it is making "significant and substantive progress," including an all-party motion that affirmed religious freedom with respect to the legislation.

Orthodox Jewish groups nationally have strongly opposed the legislation.

Cotler has said he's committed to having the House sit for an extended period this summer in order to get the bill passed.

Speaking to reporters, he said certain fears about the legislation are "simply not true."

Among them are that religious institutions would lose their charitable status if they refuse to perform same-sex marriages, or that they would be forced to rent out their "sacred spaces" for same-sex marriage receptions.

He called these concerns "unfounded."

He defended the legislation for giving "expressed protection" not only to same-sex couples, but to faith groups that have opposed the bill.

"I would hope that with the passage of the law, people will realize that apprehensions they had simply won't come to pass.

"We can't pick and choose. If there are 12 prohibited grounds for discrimination, and one is sexual orientation, and we support the 11 other grounds, then we have to protect against sexual orientation."

On other issues, Cotler referred to the May visit to Canada of Palestinian Authority (PA) leader Mahmoud Abbas as "very significant," and he praised Abbas' stated commitment to non-violence, a two-state solution and the "road map" peace plan as the bases for negotiations.

Cotler declined to comment on whether he thought First Nations politician David Ahenakew deserved to be stripped of his Order of Canada award for referring to Jews as "a disease" and for defending Adolf Hitler's slaughter of millions of Jews.

Cotler said he could not comment because the case, in which Ahenakew is accused of inciting hatred against Jews, is still before the courts.

Controversial comic to be monitored

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Just as they did last year, Jewish organizations have pledged to closely monitor the appearance by an allegedly anti-Semitic French stand-up comic when he performs at the Just for Laughs comedy festival in the coming week.

Dieudonné M'bala M'bala – who has called Zionism "the AIDS of Judaism" – is slated to make five appearances at the festival as part of its Juste pour rire French-language programming: a July 4-5 show called "Mes Excuses;" a July 7 show called "1905;" and a July 8 and July 10 show called "Pardon Judas."

Both Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), and B'nai Brith in Quebec said they were "disappointed" by the decision to invite Dieudonné back to the festival – where he has appeared at least twice previously – this year.

"Dieudonné has made a name for himself in teasing the line between free speech and hate speech and, in doing so, testing the limits of our tolerant society," said CJC-Q president Jeffrey Boro.

Known informally only by his first name, Dieudonné, 39, has gained notoriety for offending religious and other minorities, especially Jews.

One of the most publicized incidents was a December 2003 sketch on French television in which he dressed like an Orthodox Jewish settler in Israel, raised his arm in a Nazi salute, and shouted "Isra-heil."

Jewish groups upset at vandalism sentence

Jewish groups that monitor anti-Semitism are disappointed at the sentences handed to two young offenders convicted of overturning cemetery headstones and vandalizing a synagogue and a Jewish school.

The youths were convicted of simple mischief in connection with a vandalism spree in the spring of 2004, which shocked the Jewish community. The original allegations included the more serious charges that the mischief was directed against religious property and was motivated by bias, prejudice or hate. However, trial judge Walter Gonet acquitted them of that count. He ruled the two young people, who were 15 at the time, committed the mischief in a bid to get themselves on television, not to promote hatred against an identifiable group.

The youths were sentenced to two years probation. They were also ordered to pay $2,000 in restitution (they caused $12,000 in damage), volunteer in the community and attend a Holocaust education program. In addition, they were ordered to write a letter of apology to The CJN.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto called the sentence an insignificant deterrent.

"The sentence handed down in this case will never make up for the trauma these young men caused in Toronto's Jewish community and in the wider community as well," said CJC Ontario chair Joel Richler. "We don't believe this sentence is significant enough to act as a deterrent for serious crimes of hate."

B'nai Brith Canada called the sentence a "slap on the wrist."

"It is hard to see how this judgment will deter others who might choose to lash out in hate," said Brent Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada. "How can we buy into the argument that these youths were only intent on drawing attention to themselves, when their method of choice was to deliberately target one Jewish institution after another?"

However, Paula Rochman, the lawyer for one of the youths, told the court her client woke up the day after the incident "in complete shock at what he had done… He was almost physically sick."

Winnipeg Jewish museum facing cash crunch

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Heritage Centre (JHC) is facing a cash crunch that may force the organization to close its eight-year-old Marion and Ed Vickar Jewish Museum of Western Canada, said JHC president Rona Davies.

The JHC is facing a "double whammy," she said.

At the same time that its rent at the Asper Jewish Community Campus has been raised by $65,000, it has also lost a good chunk of its $100,000 annual subsidy from the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg.

The museum was created as a result of a $3.6 million federal government grant toward construction of the Asper campus. The grant was given on the condition that a museum be included in the community centre that opened in 1997.

The mandate of the Jewish Heritage Centre was to operate the museum and the attached Freeman Holocaust Centre, and to preserve the former Jewish Historical Society's extensive archives.

Over the years the museum has mounted several successful exhibitions, most recently an exhibit of photos of the Mauthausen Concentration Camp and a look at Winnipeg Jewish weddings over the past 100 years.

Davies said that 14,000 people toured the museum over the past year, even with its limited hours, and thousands more consulted the JHC's archives.

She said that the JHC has one full-time staff person and several part-time people who work for "minimal" wages, and that the organization relies on a large number of volunteers.

She added that at most, 40 per cent of the JHC budget comes from federation funds, and that the JHC has never run a deficit.

Jewish Federation of Winnipeg president Neil Duboff, said that the JHC's predicament is partly due to the community's successful campaign to attract more Jewish immigrants to the city.

More money is needed to fund English as a second language at the Gray Academy of Jewish Education, and for the Jewish Child and Family Service to aid the new immigrants who are largely from Argentina and Russia by way of Israel.

"We have had requests from our beneficiary agencies for more than $450,000 above their allocations," he said.

"We have had to rearrange our priorities to accommodate our new brothers and sisters."

Duboff said that this year, the JHC pulled out of the allocation process in which each beneficiary agency has to make a presentation before the federation's budget and allocations committee.

The JHC is in the process of restructuring, Duboff says, "so we suggested in that case that the JHC pull out of the process."

He said that the $55,000 that the federation is giving the JHC this year is interim funding while the restructuring process is still underway.

The JHC and the federation are continuing to negotiate, he said.

The most recent meeting was on June 20, he said, and "both sides are cautiously optimistic. I have a sense that the JHC leadership understands the importance of working with the general community, and that everyone is committed to making sure that the JHC has the necessary funding to carry out its functions in an appropriate manner."

Davies said that they are involved in delicate negotiations with the federation.

"However, we may have to look to other sources to make up for our funding shortfall.

"Hopefully, we will be able to find enough support in the community to keep the museum open."

JNF Negev galas raise $1.4M out West

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This year's 2005 Jewish National Fund Negev Gala, held June 15, was about vision and leadership, partnership and community – all of which were exemplified by the late Israel Asper and this year's Negev Gala honoree, the Asper Foundation, which Asper and his family created.

In accepting the honour, Asper's widow Babs recalled that her husband's philosophy was to lead by example. His daughter, Gail, who has carried on his philanthropy, noted that her father, who died in September 2003, lived life to the fullest and left the world a better place.

Asper founded the Asper Foundation in 1983. Over the past few years, it has funded many Jewish and general community initiatives in Winnipeg, such as the Asper Jewish Community Campus, the I.H. Asper School of Business at the University of Manitoba and a research wing at St. Boniface Hospital.

In addition, it has funded a program that takes junior high school students from across the country to visit the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., and it has backed the proposed Canadian Human Rights Museum to be built in Winnipeg.

The foundation has also supported educational and social initiatives in Israel, particularly in recent years a network of community action centres in partnership with JNF. There are currently three such centres – in Be'er Sheva and the development towns of Ofaqim and Mikdal Ha'emek.

They provide learning opportunities and serve as drop-in centres for disadvantaged Israeli youth. Funds raised at this year's gala and earlier ones in Edmonton on June 6 (where community leader Phyllis Adler was honoured) and Calgary on June 8 (where Lyle Oberg, Alberta's minister for infrastructure and transportation, presented JNF with a cheque for $1 million, Alberta's share of the new joint agreement on water management and irrigation research signed last month between JNF and his province) are earmarked for construction of five new community action centres in Israel.

Between the three evenings, the JNF raised a record $1.4 million, well above the original goal of $1 million.

The festivities for the 2005 Winnipeg Negev Gala began earlier in the day with a luncheon for major contributors, volunteers and out-of-town attendees. Among the latter were Sharon Marcovitz Hart, president of JNF Canada; Joe Rabinovitch, JNF Canada's national director; Esther Weinstein representing Keren Kayemet in Israel; Oberg from Alberta; a group of Black Hebrews from Dimona in Israel; and two Ethiopian Israeli youths from the Winnipeg Community Action Centre in Be'er Sheva.

At the luncheon, Hart spoke of the JNF's work in resource management and water conservation and desalination. She also commented on the Asper Foundation's "trailblazing" initiatives in human rights, social justice and social action.

Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador to Canada, spoke briefly about Israel's pending withdrawal from Gaza, the difficulties in bridging the gap between Palestinians and Israelis, and the relationship and shared values between Israel and Canada.

In thanking organizers, Gail Asper was particularly effusive in her praise for Rami Kleinmann, the JNF's shaliach for the prairie provinces.

"Rami has changed the way we view the JNF here," she said. "He has built bridges with other communities. And he seems to have more energy than my father ever had."

The gala evening attracted more than 1,700 people, a record for the community's largest fundraising event. Speakers include Marcovitz Hart, Manitoba Premier Gary Doer, Kleinmann and Len Podheiser, JNF's president for Manitoba/Saskatchewan.

After the speeches and presentation, the audience heard a concert by Duet, made up of Russian-born Israeli opera singer Yevgeni Shapovalov and Shlomit Aharon, one of Israel's top singers. They were accompanied by Habibi, Aharon's backup band.

Israel concerned by newly elected Iranian president

By DAN BARON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Few people in Israel expected a positive turnaround in Iran, but the election of hard-liner Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as president of the Islamic Republic has raised eyebrows among even the more pessimistic pundits.

Even before giving his first media conference, the fundamentalist mayor of Tehran made clear there would be no new approach toward Israel.

"I will strive to expand relations with everyone, with the exception of Israel," he told the Saudi newspaper Okaz on Sunday.

That was no surprise in itself, as political leaders in Iran must parrot the policies of the religious clerics.

But under the outgoing president, the reform-minded Mohammed Khatami, there had been an internal domestic tension that benefited Israel. Khatami even hinted that Tehran could soften its stance on the "Zionist enemy" in the event of a satisfactory Israeli-Palestinian peace deal.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Ahmadinejad is no moderate. A reserve officer in the Basij militia, which suppresses any signs of Western modernity, he enjoyed a sweeping victory in the weekend election, leading Israeli experts to reassess the strength of the reform movement in Iran.

"The surprise in itself is a very troublesome 'mishap,' as Iran is Israel's primary strategic threat, and a situation in which the election of a certain president comes as a surprise to Israel and the West cannot be tolerated," wrote Alex Fishman, the defence correspondent for Yediot Achronot.

Fishman predicted increased Iranian efforts to sabotage the recent Israeli-Palestinian rapprochement, through Tehran's Shiite proxy in Lebanon, Hezbollah, and the terrorist cells Iran sponsors in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Even Israeli Arabs are in Iran's sights, Fishman said.

"The Iranian efforts to penetrate radical groups among Israel's Arabs will be deepened, as will the espionage and subversion within Israel," he wrote.

But that threat pales in comparison to Iran's nuclear program, which Israel believes will be capable of producing weapons within months. According to Meir Litvak, an Iran expert at Tel Aviv University, Ahmadinejad has no real control over the program, as it is entirely in the clerics' hands. "They will decide on the continued development of nuclear weapons," Litvak said.

But the president-elect is not expected even to exert rhetorical pressure to rein in the program. He has already declared the pursuit of nuclear capability – he claimed it was for peaceful purposes – a national prerogative.

And he said Iran had "no significant need" for relations with the United States, a sure sign that he will not shy from a future fight to defend his country's nuclear ambitions.

Israel has long tried to keep relatively quiet in international efforts to prevent Iran getting the bomb, but on Sunday Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom spoke out.

"Faced with the Iranian nuclear threat, the international community must, more than before, formulate a unified and stern policy toward Iran," he said. "We must ensure that modern Western countries do not become hostage to Iranian radicalism."

Bielski named to head Jewish Agency

By CHARLOTTE HALLE
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERSUALEM — Ra'anana Mayor Zeev Bielski was unanimously elected chairman of the Jewish Agency last week, after former cabinet minister Natan Sharansky's candidacy was vetoed in a controversial move by the Agency's most senior panel.

The nine-person advise and consent committee, comprising the Agency's key financial backers, reportedly objected to Sharansky because of his vocal opposition to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan, fearing he would use the post of Agency chairman to undermine the plan. Sharansky recently resigned from the government over the withdrawal plan.

The Agency committee – which speedily endorsed Bielski when his candidacy was proposed by the prime minister last month – was thought to want to avoid ruling on Sharansky, knowing the Agency would be criticized for being seen to interfere with the democratic process and failing to approve a candidate of such high standing in the Jewish world.

Indeed, criticism of the Agency committee was virulent, with the majority of the World Likud faction of the Zionist General Council boycotting the vote. Yitzhak Chen, chairman of the council – whose 117 members were eligible to vote in the election – called the committee's decision "intolerable," while World Likud chairman Jacques Kupfer vehemently condemned the "maneuvering" employed to elect Bielski and questioned how Sharansky – "a hero of Israel and the Jewish People" – could possibly be considered unsuitable for the post.

Likud representative on the World Zionist Organization (WZO) executive, Danny Danon, accused the committee of causing an "earthquake" in relations between the two bodies, and blocking Sharansky's candidacy under pressure from the prime minister.

Sharansky said he views the committee's veto of his candidacy for Jewish Agency chairman as an "unprecedented violation" of the Agency's democratic process. He told Ha'aretz that he studied the organization's rules and was sure he could win the race.

"This committee was created to prevent petty Israeli politics from influencing the appointment of candidates, but what happened here – perhaps for the first time – is that it was used to introduce Israeli politics and influence the outcome of the election."

The one-time refusenik insisted he would have kept politics out of the Agency had he been appointed – "just as I fought off many attempts to let Oslo play a role in the Soviet Jewry Zionist Forum when I headed it."

In response to claims that his candidacy was never viable because of the WZO's balance of power, and that he was simply used to bash the prime minister, Sharansky said: "If it was so obvious I would lose. Why [veto me] and embarrass the prime minister and damage the prestige of the Agency? They all knew I had a very good chance of an easy victory."

Sharansky, who did not rule out running against Bielski for the post in a year's time, said the episode improved his position in the Likud party.

Sharansky supporters threatened to challenge the decision in court.

Bielski, a moderate in Likud, was expected to win the elections even if Sharansky had competed, as he was backed by the majority of factions within the Zionist General Council, including the biggest faction of Labor-Meretz, the Reform and Conservative movements, the Confederation of United Zionists and Herut. But most members of the WZO executive – including those who supported Bielski – were angry that Sharansky was not permitted to compete.

Israeli passport apology ends diplomatic spat

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WELLINGTON, N.Z. — Israel's apology for two of its citizens illegally obtaining New Zealand passports is proof the men were spies, Prime Minister Helen Clark said Monday.

In a letter released Sunday, Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom apologized for the involvement of Israeli citizens in criminal activities and vowed to take steps to ensure it doesn't happen again.

"We believe there was a very good reason for the apology. The apology has been offered and I think it speaks for itself," Clark told reporters a day after Israel apologized, allowing the two nations to restore full diplomatic relations and end an 11-month spat.

"It is an acknowledgment that these people were associated with Israeli intelligence agencies. That's always been our belief," she said.

Israeli sources emphasized that Shalom's letter did not accept Israel's responsibility for the acts attributed to the Israelis. As in other recent affairs of Mossad agents being arrested in Cyprus and Switzerland, Israel at first refused to assume responsibility or apologize, but at a later stage did so.

Israel's relations with New Zealand deteriorated in March 2004, when two Israelis believed to be Mossad agents were arrested for attempting to obtain a New Zealand passport fraudulently. Uriel Kelman, a dual Israeli and Canadian national, and Elisha Cara – who were working with two other agents, according to New Zealand police – applied for the passport using the identity of a quadriplegic man.

In their interrogation, the two denied working for Israel and insisted they were private businessmen. However, after Israel hired local attorneys on their behalf, they reached a plea bargain and admitted to some of the charges.

They were tried for attempting to obtain a passport fraudulently, but not for spying. They were sentenced to six months in jail and fined some $50,000. After serving three months in prison, they were released and sent back to Israel.

New Zealand authorities have issued an arrest warrant for a third member of the group, New Zealander Tony Resnick, and Interpol has been alerted, Clark said.

Resnick, who fled New Zealand when the others were apprehended, is believed to be hiding in Israel.

It transpired during the police investigation and from statements of New Zealand cabinet ministers that the group was involved in a Mossad operation to obtain New Zealand passports, which they had planned to use in future operations of an unclear nature. The investigation also revealed that Cara had served as a department head in the Mossad for more than 20 years, but quit and joined a private company at the beginning of the year.

The New Zealand government said two other Israelis were involved in the affair. One was identified as Ze'ev Barkan, a former Israeli diplomat who served in Israel's embassies in Brussels and Vienna. The local police were also searching for a citizen of New Zealand, Resnick, who was believed to have assisted the Mossad agents. All three managed to flee the country before they were caught.

When Israel refused to apologize for the affair, New Zealand suspended all high-level contacts with Israel. It barred President Moshe Katsav and Deputy Chief of Staff Maj.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi from visiting New Zealand earlier this year, on their way to Australia.

Clark said New Zealand has changed its regulations for issuing passports, and if Israel managed to obtain passports prior to the arrests, it would be foolish to use them because they've been voided.

The announcement followed several months of diplomatic negotiations between the two countries. Israel's agreement to apologize and submit a commitment that such acts would not recur constitutes a victory for Clark and her cabinet, who demanded this from the moment the affair erupted.

Cotler competes in Maccabiah

He will not be the oldest member of the 390-member Canadian team going to the games, which will run from July 10 to 21. Gerskup said there will be at least one master's tennis player in the over-75 contest.

"We are really proud and honoured. How often do you get a member of Parliament and a cabinet minister competing in the Maccabiah?" Gerskup said. "I'm told he was a pretty good player."

Gerskup added that Cotler has been a longtime supporter of Maccabiah and was an honorary member of the Canadian delegation at the 2001 games, when he marched into the stadium during the opening ceremonies.

Gerskup expects Cotler will have some pretty stiff competition.

"It all depends on the draw," he said.

Abbas not weak: Olmert

Mahmoud Abbas cultivates a false image of weakness, Israel's deputy prime minister said. Abbas "is in love with his image of weakness, because he believes that this helps him mobilize international pressure on Israel to make more concessions," Ehud Olmert told the Jerusalem Post, referring to the Palestinian Authority president's claims that he does not have the power to crack down on terrorists in the West Bank and Gaza as required by the U.S.-led "road map" peace plan. Olmert said Abbas is actually in a position of strength because he is supported by the Arab world and in charge of Palestinian security forces.

Thankful for small mercies

Ariel Sharon thanked Micronesia for its support of Israel. The Israeli prime minister hosted Micronesian President Joseph Urusemal in Jerusalem and vowed to bolster bilateral co-operation in agriculture, medicine and education. The tiny South Pacific island federation is an unswerving supporter of Israel at the United Nations, a trend attributed to the pro-Zionist tendencies of its overwhelmingly Christian population. Urusemal, on the third visit to the Jewish state by a Micronesian president, said his country condemns all terror against Israeli targets and backs the upcoming pullout from Gaza.

Bill Gates to visit Israel

Microsoft founder Bill Gates will visit Israel in October. The Israeli business newspaper Globes reported the visit is part of Gates' annual tour of Europe, where Gates meets with government and market leaders. He is scheduled to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Islamic Jihad in the sights

Israel has decided to resume "targeted killings" of Islamic Jihad leaders. The decision was made after attacks by the Palestinian terror group killed two Israelis, security sources said. Israel suspended its track-and-kill operations against terrorists in the West Bank and Gaza as part of the truce Prime Minister Ariel Sharon declared with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in February. Earlier, Israel arrested 52 Islamic Jihad operatives in the West Bank.

Gay pride parade cancelled

Jerusalem called off this year's gay pride parade in the holy city. Mayor Uri Lupolianski wrote to organizers of the annual parade, saying he had decided the event offended the sensibilities of Jerusalem's religious population and should not go ahead next week as scheduled. The Jerusalem Open House, which represents gays and lesbians in the capital, petitioned the High Court of Justice, demanding it reverse the decision. Media reports said the parade's organizers had vowed to keep participants attire modest to avoid causing offence.

Zionism's quiet supporters

Most Israeli Arabs back the idea of a Jewish state, a survey found. According to the poll released as part of a Jaffa conference on race relations, 70 per cent of Israel's Arab citizens said Israel has the right to exist as a democratic Jewish state, and a quarter voiced support for government efforts to maintain its Jewish majority. About half of Arab respondents said they did not trust Israeli Jews, while 60 per cent of Jews said the same about their Arab compatriots. The survey found that 25 per cent of Israeli Jews believe Arabs should not enjoy full civil rights, and that 70 per cent of Jews avoid travelling to Arab towns in Israel.

Fatal train wreck

Seven people were killed in a train wreck in southern Israel last week. At least 120 were believed injured after a train hit a truck near Kiryat Gat. The train was travelling to Be'er Sheva from northern Israel when the collision occurred. Officials said it was one of the worst train wrecks in Israeli history.

Conservative Jews face crossroads

By CHANAN TIGAY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Analysis

It has become axiomatic in certain circles to say that the Conservative Movement is at a crossroads as it considers its future.

With the recent announcement of the upcoming retirement of Rabbi Ismar Schorsch, longtime chancellor of the movement's flagship Jewish Theological Seminary, elements of that future are now slightly less clear, and may hinge in large part on who is selected to succeed Rabbi Schorsch.

"I think it's a turning point," said Rabbi Neil Cooper, spiritual leader of Temple Beth Hillel-Beth El in suburban Philadelphia. "I think that when the chancellor took over 20 years ago, the challenges facing the seminary and the movement were very different."

Roundly praised for bolstering what he calls "serious Jewish education" among Conservative Jews, Rabbi Schorsch is retiring at a time of uncertainty for the movement as a whole.

During his tenure, the number of Conservative day school students jumped, as did the number of students at JTS itself, and the seminary established a large graduate school for Jewish education.

Yet insiders say the movement today is in the throes of an identity crisis, facing dwindling numbers of Americans identifying as Conservative, internal debate over the place of gays and non-Jewish spouses in the fold and difficulties speaking in a unified voice. How the movement resolves such contentious issues will be significantly impacted by the next chancellor.

It seems clear that those charged with choosing a new chancellor would be well aware of candidates' stands on these issues, and that their selection could be a bellwether for the future direction of the movement.

"I think that the next chancellor is probably going to be addressing those issues more directly," Rabbi Cooper said. "All of those kinds of things are pulling at us."

In a June 15 letter to the JTS community and supporters, Rabbi Schorsch said he would step down officially on June 30, 2006, some 20 years after taking the reins.

"I do so with more than a tinge of sadness, because throughout my tenure, I have found my work deeply fulfilling," wrote Rabbi Schorsch, who will be 70 when he retires. "But I decided long ago to step down while still in top form."

Under Rabbi Schorsch's watch, the movement's camping and day-school arms have grown, with 25,000 students now attending Conservative Schechter Schools and an additional 25,000 Conservative students in community day schools – non-denominational Jewish academies. Conservative students, JTS says, now comprise 25 per cent of the national day school population.

The JTS student body also has grown, jumping from 500 students in 1994 to 700 today. The school's faculty has increased from 90 members in 1994 to 120 today.

In 1996, JTS established the William Davidson Graduate School of Jewish Education, which the seminary says is the largest school of its kind in the country. Rabbi Schorsch has also worked to bolster the Conservative Movement's affiliates in Russia, Argentina and Israel.

He has raised $500 million in annual campaign dollars and more than $265 million in the school's capital campaign that ended in 2004 alone.

Under Rabbi Schorsch "we consistently have strong annual campaigns, a balanced budget and effective financial management," a seminary spokesperson said in an e-mail.

That's despite news reports that emerged in December indicating that JTS was in debt and was selling off buildings and instituting a hiring freeze to cover loans. JTS denies it froze hires, and continues to maintain that its financial position is strong.

As JTS vice-chancellor for institutional advancement, Rabbi Carol Davidson often is on the road with Rabbi Schorsch, raising money for the school. Although he is 20 years her elder, she said, when she's tired after a day of strenuous fundraising, Rabbi Schorsch still has the strength to debrief and analyze the day's events.

That's indicative not only of his "boundless energy," but also his "laser vision about just how important serious support of the institution is," she said.

Since its inception, the Conservative Movement has walked a fine line between adhering to Halachah, or Jewish law, and embracing modernity and a modern approach to religious observance. Rabbi Schorsch, for his part, often has come down on the side of tradition, a stance that has not been without controversy.

"It's much easier to join a movement that doesn't have norms," he said in a recent interview. "The challenge of Conservative Judaism is to be in and of the world without surrendering the importance of norms and boundaries."

Among these boundaries is the movement's policy precluding the ordination of openly gay rabbis and against allowing its rabbis to officiate at same-sex weddings. Some have said privately that it was unlikely these policies would be changed as long as Rabbi Schorsch was at the seminary's helm.

Rabbi Schorsch, for his part, dismisses the argument.

"I don't exaggerate my influence," he said. "I think I've been a voice. I'm not sure I've been a determinative voice. The debate will continue."

In March, the committee on Jewish law and standards of the movement's rabbinic arm will meet to examine several tshuvot, or responsa, on the place of homosexuality in the Conservative Movement. Those with knowledge of the committee's workings say it could pass tshuvot both in favour of and opposing an easing of the movement's restrictions on homosexuality.

A tshuvah that garners the votes of one-quarter of the committee's members is considered an official, halachically tenable opinion, even if another responsa gets a majority of the votes.

In such a case, they say, the new chancellor will play a significant role in determining which tshuvah to rally around and, by extension, how the movement approaches the issue in the future.

The role of women in the rabbinate may be another area in which a new chancellor could make strides, observers say. Conservative women rabbis are paid less than their male counterparts, occupy fewer senior positions and are more likely to be unmarried, according to a movement survey.

A new JTS head could work to ensure that those arenas that are supposed to be egalitarian "are truly egalitarian," said Rabbi Bradley Shavit Artson, dean of the Ziegler School of Rabbinic Studies at the University of Judaism in Los Angeles – and could work to move gender issues into the public eye.

OVERNIGHT FRENCH TOAST WITH BLUEBERRIES

So simple to prepare and yet so delicious, friends will think you run a bed and breakfast in Vermont! Heat leftovers, if there are any, in the microwave.

Caramel:
1 cup packed brown sugar
½ cup unsalted butter
1 tsp. cinnamon, optional

Toast:
12 thick slices challah or brioche
1½ cups fresh or frozen blueberries or raspberries

Custard:
5 large eggs
1½ cups milk
1½ tsp. vanilla extract
½ tsp. salt

For the caramel, bring the brown sugar, butter and cinnamon to a boil in a small saucepan and stir with a wooden spoon. Let boil for 2 minutes and turn off the heat. The caramel will be brown, thick and bubbly.

Drizzle the caramel evenly over the bottom of a 9 x 13-in. (3.5 L) baking dish. Cover with 6 slices of bread. Scatter the berries overtop. Place the remaining 6 slices of bread on the fruit.

For the custard, whisk together the eggs, milk, vanilla and salt in a medium-size bowl. Pour this evenly over the bread. Press down lightly with plastic wrap so that the bread absorbs the custard. Refrigerate overnight.

Preheat oven to 350. Remove the plastic wrap and bake the French toast uncovered for 40 to 50 minutes until puffed and golden. Cut into squares, invert to show the caramel and place on a serving platter. Serves 6 to 8

Variation: Sliced bananas, raspberries or a combination of both may be used instead of the blueberries.

Chef's Tip: To clean the dried caramel from the pot, fill the pot with water and bring to a simmer. Let sit and then clean. Residue will wash away quickly.

PEPPER-CRUSTED MAPLE-GLAZED SALMON

An elegant no-fuss classic. This can also be prepared with chicken or very firm tofu. In the summertime, grill the marinated fish directly over hot coals for about 3 minutes per side.

¾ cup pure maple syrup
¼ cup soy sauce
4 6-oz. (175 g) salmon fillets, skin removed
¼ cup coarsely ground pepper
½ tsp. peanut or other vegetable oil, or a fine mist of oil spray

In a small deep bowl, or resealable plastic bag, mix together the maple syrup and soy sauce. Arrange the fillets so that the marinade completely covers the fish. Marinate in the refrigerator for 30 to 60 minutes.

Preheat oven to 400. Line a baking sheet with aluminum foil. Rub oil over the foil. Place the pepper on a small plate. Remove the salmon from the marinade and pat the top side only into the pepper to coat. Place the fillets, pepper side up, on the prepared baking sheet. Bake on the top rack of the oven for 7 minutes. The syrup may cause the fish to smoke when cooking so don't be alarmed. If it starts to burn, loosely cover with foil. Serve with Oven Roasted Asparagus (below). Serves 4.

OVEN-ROASTED ASPARAGUS

Add to any antipasto platter, frittata or salad – these are so good there may be none left when it comes time to put them on the platter!

2 lb. (1 kg) asparagus, stems trimmed
2 tbsp. olive oil kosher salt
freshly ground pepper

Preheat oven to 400. Line a baking sheet with a silpat mat or parchment paper. In a large bowl, toss the asparagus with the oil and add salt and pepper to taste. Spread the asparagus in a single layer on the baking sheet. Place in the oven and roast until the asparagus is vibrant green, soft and starting to wrinkle, about 10 minutes, depending on thickness. Serve warm or at room temperature. Serves 4.

Variation: Trimmed green beans, Brussels sprouts and broccoli can all take the place of the asparagus. Just remember that all the vegetables should be cut the same size to ensure even cooking. Reduce the cooking time for thinner vegetables such as green beans.

Chef's Tip: To snap the tough ends off the asparagus, hold the spear about 1 inch up from the bottom. Bend the spear until it snaps.

TIRAMISU

An Italian trifle that is often made with stale sponge cake soaked in espresso and brandy. When translated literally, tiramisu means "pick me up" – and it certainly does! This version is made without eggs. For a sophisticated finale, prepare the tiramisu in individual martini glasses.

2 lb. mascarpone cheese, at room temperature
1½ cups heavy cream (35%)
1¼ cups sugar
2 tsp. vanilla extract
2½ cups cold strong espresso coffee
¼ cup brandy or dark rum
1 14-oz. package ladyfinger cookies (about 40 cookies)
¼ cup unsweetened cocoa powder shaved semisweet chocolate, for garnish

This can be prepared either in a large trifle bowl or a 9 x 13-in. dish.

In a large stand mixer bowl, beat the marscapone, cream, sugar and vanilla for 2 minutes until thick and creamy.

In a shallow bowl, mix the cold coffee with the brandy or rum. Lightly dip half the ladyfingers into the liquid one at a time and place them very close together in the trifle bowl or dish.

Spread half the mascarpone mixture over the soaked ladyfingers. Sift half the cocoa powder over the mascarpone through a fine mesh sieve. Top with the remaining ladyfingers, dipped in espresso mixture, then with the remaining mascarpone to make another layer. Sprinkle with the cocoa powder again.

Cover the dish with plastic wrap and refrigerate for several hours. The longer it rests, the more flavourful it will be. Just before serving, remove the plastic wrap and sprinkle some shaved chocolate overtop. Makes 16 to 20 servings.

German scholar studies Jewish Canadian writing

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

MARBURG, Germany — In an improbable juxtaposition, Fabienne Quennet holds forth on Jewish Canadian writers in this quaint town of half-timbered buildings some 90 kilometres north of Frankfurt.

A 39-year-old lecturer on Canadian and American literature at Philipps University – Europe's first Protestant institution of higher learning – she is virtually the only scholar in Germany who has seriously immersed herself in this topic.

Within the framework of the university's inter-disciplinary Centre for Canadian Studies, which was established four years ago, she has taught seminars on Jewish Canadian, American, British and Australian novelists and short story writers.

As well, she has written an introductory essay on Jewish Canadian literature for the centre's annual publication, Ahornblatter, the cover of which is adorned with a smattering of red maple leafs.

Later this year, at the University of Strasbourg in France, Quennet is scheduled to deliver a lecture on Toronto novelist Lillian Nattel.

And recently, she contributed an essay for a book on Canadian literature the University of Ottawa Press plans to publish in the near future.

Quennet, who has been on staff of Philipps University for the past decade, discovered the Jewish Canadian novel in the late 1990s after reading Fugitive Pieces by Ann Michaels.

"I thought it was a wonderful work," she explained in a recent interview. "I was interested in memory, and that's what she dealt with. And from a German perspective, I thought it was daring to write a novel about the Holocaust."

Her appetite whetted by Michaels, Quennet segued into the novels of Mordecai Richler, whose humour she found appealing.

"He imparts a sense of understatement and self-deprecation, which is not particularly German," observed Quennet, who conducted research on Jewish Canadian literature at the University of British Columbia several years ago.

Quennet has also delved into Canadian prose by Norman Levine, Matt Cohen, Naim Kattan, Henry Kreisel and Howard Engel, and Canadian poetry by Abraham Moses Klein, Leonard Cohen, Eli Mandel and Irving Layton.

In general, Canada is on Germany's cultural radar screen, and major Jewish Canadian authors have been translated into German. "They're well represented in the book market," she said.

Yet only a handful of German and other European academics have explored this genre, notably Albert-Reiner Glaap of the University of Dusseldorf and Eugen Banauch of the University of Vienna.

According to Quennet, Jewish Canadian writers struggle more with their position in society than their counterparts in the United States.

"Americans feel more secure, but with Canadians, there is a vague sense of insecurity. In Canada, Jews are more distinctive. In the United States, they have blended in to a greater degree."

In her essay in Ahornblatter, Quennet argues that Jewish writing in Canada, due to waves of immigration, has been subjected to many linguistic and thematic influences.

As she puts it: "Mainly the literature appears in English, French, Yiddish and Hebrew, but in the past some writers have chosen to use the language of their origins and written in, for example, German and Hungarian."

Fabienne Quennet

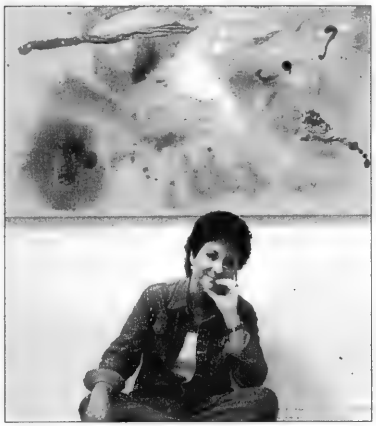
Citing young and upcoming writers such as David Bezmozgis, Nancy Richler and Nora Gold, she claims Jewish writing in Canada is not only thriving but occupies a central place in the contemporary Canadian canon.

Quennet, who was born in Munich and is of French and German origin, believes Germans are generally interested in Jewish culture.

"It's not a question of guilt but of genuine interest," she said, referring to Jewish history and food and klezmer music.

Quennet, whose grandfather was a member of the Nazi party and whose grandmother admired Hitler, acknowledged that German history will be stained by the Holocaust for generations to come.

But she is of the view that young Germans are much more open to different cultures and traditions than their parents and grandparents.



Judy Singer

Abstract artist's new exhibition 'Worlds' presents a visual and narrative calm

ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

In a world filled with doom and gloom, a walk through Judy Singer's artwork is a welcome relief.

Her art, which has been described as spontaneous and uplifting, is a reflection of an outlook that is both upbeat and positive. And with 18 solo exhibitions and 28 group abstract showings to date, Singer is clearly a very talented painter.

"Worlds," her current show, at the Moore Gallery, is a continuation of a 30-year career of creating abstract paintings that use colour, texture and balance to present a visual and narrative calm that borders on the spiritual.

"Religion definitely expanded my outlook on life," she said in an interview at her sunlit studio lined with paintings as large as six feet high stacked side by side.

"I was always interested in spirituality but became more involved in Judaism when I met my husband, Henry Gotfryd, who is observant," she added. In 1990, she produced a collection called "Paintings Inspired by the Writings," a series of works based on biblical passages.

Looking back on a 30-year career that has positioned her as one of Canada's leading female painters, Singer talks about her teachers as having been inspirational mentors.

JUDEN FREI FOCUSES ON HISTORY OF UKRAINIAN SHTETL

Moscow filmmaker Michael Masterovoy, who was in Toronto last month for the Hot Docs and Jewish film festivals, is in the finishing stages of Juden Frei, a 52-minute documentary about the history of the Ukrainian shtetl Brailov and the fate of one of its families, the Kemelmans. "It's basically about the shtetl life in the 20th century," he said.

The film was made for Russian TV, but Masterovoy's company has hired Chaim Topol to provide English narration to make it accessible to North American audiences. He's currently in negotiation with the American TV network PBS and expresses hope the film might also enjoy a theatrical release.

Masterovoy, who studied film in New York and had a previous documentary in the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, found a lot of rare stock footage of Ukrainian Jews in state archives in Kiev and elsewhere. Soviet filmmakers recorded many scenes of police closing down synagogues, he said. "Now access to all the archives is open. You can easily get anything you want – if you have the money, of course." He's already planning future projects about the Jews of Georgia and Bukhara.

While in Toronto, Masterovoy visited relatives in Richmond Hill, and was impressed by the high concentration of former Russian Jews along the north Bathurst corridor. "It's like the Brighton Beach of Canada," he observed, "except that it's probably more civilized."

Book News : Toronto publishing house McClelland and Stewart recently reprinted Dr. Stephen Speisman's 1979 book, The Jews of Toronto: A History to 1937. Speisman, former director of the Ontario Jewish Archives for 28 years, based the book on his doctoral dissertation in history at the University of Toronto. Except for a new cover, the reprinted edition is identical to the original: it was reproduced photographically, a process that forbids revision.

Now the executive director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park, Speisman said he's working on a second volume to bring the history closer to the present time. However, publication is not imminent. "It's a work in progress, so don't expect it tomorrow," he said.

As a young child, Singer believed that creative girls could become either fashion designers or interior decorators. Her turning point came at age 15, when she decided to enrol in a neighbourhood art school. It was Morton Harris, her first art teacher at the MSH Studio School of Art, who suggested that she pursue a commercial career in art.

"But I decided to go to university for one year to try it out," Singer said. There, she met people who opened up her world.

Art critic Ken Carpenter taught her how to see and analyze paintings. "Because art is such a visual language, you need to become fluent in that language," she said. "You need to know the grammar and vocabulary."

While at York University, she also studied with Tim Whiten and Ken Lochead. Before completing her degree in fine arts, Singer had her first lucky break.

In 1974, during her fourth year of art school, her work was presented at a Young Canadian Artist display at a Beth Tzedec Congregation fundraiser. A dealer named Jack Pollock happened by and offered her a show in his gallery.

"It gave me instant credibility," Singer said.

In 1982, Singer was one of two artists chosen to represent Canada in the Carnegie International, a travelling exhibit of 63 artists from 27 countries.

Besides teaching art part-time at York University, Singer has also experimented with fabric painting and owned a bakery. Singer notes that each experience has had a positive learning element to it.

"The bakery taught me a lot about business," she said. "Artists are notoriously bad businesspeople. And while I'm still an artist in the studio, I'm a little more professional in terms of the business side of my work," she said.

Despite her venture into other projects, Singer always comes back to her art. She's already planning upcoming shows for the next few years in other cities.

Her current exhibit, "Worlds," is on at the Moore Gallery, 80 Spadina Ave., Suite 404, until July 16.

Local director takes her shows to Prague synagogue

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Toronto director/producer Judy Kopelow is taking her innovative productions of Children of a Vanished World and White Rose to Prague for the Three Rings Project Arts Festival.

Children of a Vanished World, staged originally in Toronto in 2002 and 2003, is a multimedia event that projects 70 of Roman Vishniak's powerful photographs onto a 10-by-14-foot screen, accompanied by narration and Yiddish folk music.

Vishniak's camera caught the faces of Jewish children and their families in Eastern Europe between 1935 and 1939, shortly before the community's destruction.

"After I did Children here, I wanted to do it in Eastern Europe, where these children lived and died," Kopelow said.

The performances will be at the Spanish Synagogue, a Gothic-style building built in 1868 in the Jewish quarter of Prague.

Kopelow said while it's always a challenge to mount a production in a new venue, this one makes it especially difficult. She said it will be an emotional strain to perform so close to where these people walked.

"Being in the synagogue, where many of these children sat, will be very moving. There's a real responsibility for us to respectfully remember those that lived there, and who ultimately perished."

Just a few weeks before the production in Prague begins – it runs July 3 to 6 – Kopelow has yet to see the synagogue.

"I was sent some floor plans of the building, so we are able to rehearse the production to scale," she said.

White Rose, which premiered in Toronto for Holocaust Education Week last fall, is a one-act opera by contemporary German composer Udo Zimmermann. Kopelow will direct and adapt the production to the synagogue. Sabatino Vacca conducts the Czech 15-piece orchestra.

White Rose tells the story of Hans and Sophie Scholl, who were members of the University of Munich's student resistance group, White Rose, in Nazi Germany.

Inside Prague's Spanish Synagogue.

"They were part of a group that wrote and distributed leaflets calling for an intellectual call to arms against the Nazi regime," Kopelow said. Approximately 16,000 leaflets were distributed before the group was caught and its members killed by guillotine.

"The opera tells the story of these two people as they sit in jail reflecting on their childhood, their family, friends and future as they face their death."

Kopelow is also making plans to take this production to other places, including Poland, Germany and Israel.

The Three Rings Arts Festival (www.threerings.com) is the brainchild of Harry Hurwitz, who worked on a previous Kopelow production. It examines Western culture through cultural events, including music and conferences.

Toronto-born poet wins PEN award

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

Toronto-born poet Yerra Sugarman has won a prestigious American literary award for a debut collection of poems, Forms of Gone, which captures the experience of growing up as a daughter of Holocaust survivors in a north Toronto survivor community.

A university instructor who has lived in New York for more than 20 years, Sugarman received the $5,000 PEN American Center poetry prize at an awards ceremony at the Lincoln Center's Walter Reade Theater in late May.

The 28 other prize winners included Jewish playwright and actor Wallace Shawn for drama and the late Paul Celan, a Holocaust survivor and poet.

Although trained as a visual artist, Sugarman said she decided a few years ago to attempt to express herself by writing. She worked on her poems through a sequence of writing workshops at Manhattan's 92nd Street "Y" in the late '90s.

"I knew I couldn't say what I had to say in painting and that the art world is not that receptive to certain subject matters," she said. "I knew that somehow, if I wanted to convey this, I couldn't do it visually," she said.

"[Writing poetry] feels to me very closely related to making visual art such as collage or sculpture – I can play with the shape of it. Poetry is very visual on the page, so it felt very natural."

Her parents, Sam and Pearl Sugarman, came from a town near Krakow, Poland, fled to the Soviet Union and France during World War II, and arrived in Canada with a son in 1951. Yerra was born in 1955 and grew up immersed in the large survivor colony in north Toronto.

She attended William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute and studied visual arts at Concordia and Columbia universities. Her parents, who were members of Clanton Park Synagogue, both died in 2000.

In a short essay, she described the theme of Forms of Gone as "bearing witness to loss that affected me daily, that I had inherited, yet experienced vicariously or 'at a remove' from the actual events that had been its agent and marked the lives of those about whom I wrote."

Sugarman has completed – but not yet published – a second collection of poetry called Glass and has begun a third. She has also penned literary criticism and articles for several publications, including the Oxford Encyclopedia of American Literature.

A resident of Greenwich Village, she teaches creative writing and advanced poetry workshops at City College and New York University. Her course at NYU is titled Creative Writing of Remembrance and Witness.

Although she won a Discovery award for poetry in 1998, Sugarman said she was "totally shocked" when she won the PEN award. "I knew that I liked writing, but I didn't know that I would be a poet," she said.

Now, as a result of winning the award, she has been admitted into the august ranks of a distinguished writers' organization.

PEN American Center, the U.S. branch of PEN International, was founded in 1922 and has a present membership of about 2,900 writers, poets, editors and translators. Legendary past members have included James Baldwin, Willa Cather, Robert Frost, Langston Hughes, Thomas Mann, Arthur Miller, Susan Sontag and John Steinbeck.

Forms of Gone was published by Sheep Meadow Press of Riverdale-on-Hudson, New York.

A writer comes of age: Henry Kreisel's wartime writings

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

The prestigious American literary magazine PMLA publishes what it calls "little-known documents" – discoveries from library and private archives whose contents vary from Gertrude Stein's table talk to the early drafts of Soviet literary revolutionaries.

Among the little-known documents of Canadian Jewish literature that deserve a wider readership is a remarkable diary written by Henry Kreisel, when he and his father were interned in a New Brunswick "enemy alien" camp.

Kreisel and his parents escaped from Nazi Vienna to England shortly before the onset of World War II. In the spring of 1940, with the young Kreisel working in a London garment factory, the two men were caught up in what Kreisel recalled as an effort by the British government "to reassure its own population that it was on guard, alert to the dangers posed by potential fifth columnists."

In a deal struck with the Canadian government, hundreds of these imaginary enemies, along with actual Nazi prisoners of war, were transported across the sea to the woods near Fredericton. At Camp B, as it was called, Kreisel spent a year and a half.

Though Kreisel made youthful efforts at writing before being forced to flee Austria, he viewed his camp experience as "central to [his] own development" as a writer. Among his fellow internees were numerous Jewish academics, writers and musicians, including Emil Fackenheim, Peter Oberlander and Max Stern, whose contributions after the war in the areas of philosophy, visual arts and city planning would prove influential.

Among such impressive compatriots, Kreisel wrote of receiving "a liberal education in many ways more remarkable than the article available in universities."

Kreisel's Diary of an Internment is an excellent historical source for a strange and uniquely Canadian chapter of World War II. In his view, the internees were treated reasonably, and when they did work, the Canadian landscape presented them with respite.

In a diary entry from June 1941, Kreisel wrote: "A very beautiful day. We worked directly at the little brook still farther away from the camp. When we entered the camp, it reminded me of animals being let into a big cage."

He embarks on a Kafkaesque struggle to receive permission from the camp commander to send his early efforts at fiction out for consideration: "To think that I need the consent of such a fellow, who has, I am sure, not read 20 books in his whole life."

And the young internee even finds sympathy for a Fredericton rabbi who arrives to give a speech that tells the camp inmates not to "grumble at being interned."

"I don't blame him," Kreisel writes, "he had to do it."

Cutting wood in the camp's surrounding forest, Kreisel's literary ambitions are fuelled by discussions with his compatriots: "I felled one tree only; the other time I spend discussing with my friend H.A. Lissauer about writing. I think of writing a new short novel…"

In the immediate postwar years, Kreisel studied English at the University of Toronto and began, in 1944, at the age of 23, to sketch the material that would take shape as his first novel, The Rich Man.

Published in 1948 by McClelland & Stewart, it is among the first major works on Jewish themes by a Jewish writer published in Canada by a mainstream publisher. Kreisel did not exaggerate when, late in his career, he told an interviewer that he saw himself as "one of the first people to bring modern Canadian literature the experience of the immigrant."

The Rich Man's action begins in the College and Spadina neighbourhood, where Kreisel lived upon settling in Toronto. It portrays Spadina-area streetscapes and sweatshop work, and paints a rather down-beat portrait of the Jewish immigrant experience. The novel's startling narrative leap takes shape as the novel's main character – an immigrant from Vienna who works in a local factory – decides to make a return trip, at great cost, to see his family.

The bulk of the novel then, captures the creeping state of dread and helplessness experienced by Viennese Jews shortly before the war. The returnee from the goldene medine is mistaken for a rich man, and awkwardly allows his European relatives to believe he has made a great success of himself in Canada.

Kreisel did not publish another novel until the 1964 appearance of The Betrayal, which again takes up themes of double lives created by the challenge of immigration and exile. He devoted much of his energy to a long and productive scholarly and administrative career at the University of Alberta.

As an Edmontonian, his writing embraced the particularity of the prairie landscape, though prewar Europe and the Holocaust continued to haunt his fiction and memoiristic writing. His Diary of an Internment has never had a wide readership.

It appeared first, in 1974, in a small Edmonton-based journal, and was reprinted a decade later in a volume entitled Another Country: Henry Kreisel.

In the diary's crisp, stoical prose, we see a young man's artistic consciousness taking shape under the shadow of exile. At the same time, the diary provides us with a prelude to the appearance of one of the first Jewish voices in mainstream Canadian fiction.

Norman Ravvin's most recent novel is Lola by Night. He is co-editor of The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader and chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Dr. Michael offers cure for lonely hearts

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

When Michael Horowitz first made the move from Toronto to Vancouver four years ago, the eligible, young bachelor asked himself, "Where are all the single Jewish girls?"

Since he posed that question, Horowitz, a 31-year-old chiropractor, decided that if he was going to find his soul mate in Vancouver, he was going to have to do something about bringing young Jewish singles together.

With a Jewish population of only 25,000 in Vancouver, compared to Toronto's 200,000 and Montreal's 100,000, Horowitz was determined to add an element of cohesion to the city's Jewish community.

"A few months after the move [to Vancouver] I decided that since I didn't know that many people, I wanted to develop a network of friends, I wanted to go to some Jewish events. I was kind of disappointed to see there was not much going on. And what was going on was not really catered to young Jewish singles or young Jewish professionals," Horowitz said.

He decided that instead of whine about it, he was going to take the initiative and plan the exact kind of party he had been looking for.

Horowitz came up with a concept that he felt was sure to strike a chord with his brethren in the 25 to 40 age group.

He called his first party the "I hate being a single Jew on Valentine's Day" party, which was later renamed Jewish Love Potion.

It was nothing like Shabbat dinner at the rabbi's house.

The venue was chic, the music was loud, the booze flowed and the Jews came.

The turnout for this party was even better than he had hoped.

"I was blown away with 250 people. I guess that's the thing about Vancouver. If there is something going on in the Jewish community, friends will tell friends and it will spread very quickly," he said.

"I was shocked and it was just so exciting and for the first time in my life I thought, 'Wow, there are actually some young Jewish people around here.'"

With the success of what was supposed to be a one-time event, he knew it wasn't going to end there. He created Dr. Michael Events, posted a website, lured sponsors and spread the word like wildfire all over North America.

Since then, Horowitz has organized events with names such as Jewtopia, JEWCY, Jews Gone Wild and Schmoozerella.

"After doing four or six parties in Vancouver, I thought, 'Hey, I recall there's quite a few Jews in Toronto. I want to be able to come back and visit family a few times a year anyway, so why not make an excuse to see what can happen in Toronto,'" Horowitz said.

Encouraged by great turnouts in Toronto, Dr. Michael Events expanded to Montreal, New York, Florida, Seattle and Portland.

Horowitz recently organized a party at the Sugar Lounge in Toronto called Jewlicious, which featured a performance by a belly dancer, and he said he has plans for another party at the end of the summer.

Despite the success of his parties that draw crowds ranging from 150 to 400 people, Horowitz understands the stigma surrounding "Jew-dos," and the pressure to marry within the faith, which often turns people off from attending his parties.

Michael Horowitz [Benji Feldman photo]

"It's kind of tough because people don't like going to Jew-dos. I never liked going to Jew-dos. I'd like to think of it more as a networking framework. A great way to meet new friends and to connect with previous friends. But of course, there are going to be some singles cruising as well."

Horowitz also understands the difficulty that young North American Jews face when trying to romantically connect with other Jewish youths.

"Although our parents would love us to meet a Jewish mate, it's not so easy. I think there are a lot of Jewish people in their 20s and 30s who want to feel that it would be a good idea to, but we live in a society that it's not that easy to connect with someone. These parties have become an opportunity for people to connect," Horowitz said.

"Jewish people want to meet other Jewish people. We have a common bond. We have tradition and we understand each other in a way that others cannot."

While Horowitz has yet to connect with his soul mate, he is proud to announce that five marriages have come out of his parties, which motivates him to continue offering this public service to Jews around the continent.

While he plans these parties as more of a hobby rather than a way to make money, there is usually an entry fee to cover the cost of renting the venue. If he does make a profit, he always donates 10 per cent to a Jewish charity or organization.

"It can cost as much as $3,000, or $3,500 to throw a party, and I've lost money before. So, I don't mind when I make some money. But when I hear that people are connecting, getting engaged and married, it's awesome. It's what it's all about. It's about bringing Jewish people together," he said.

REMEMBERING JERUSALEM: From left, Robyn Grunberg, Laurenne Kredenster and Elianna Weiss pose in front of their Jerusalem project in the Israel Interactive Centre at Bialik Hebrew Day School. Students in grades 4 and 5 work at the centre to research various topics related to Israel, such as its culture, architecture, geography, water and weather. They then build models and other representations of the concepts they've studied.

Maccabiah hoops tourney a homecoming for three Canadians

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For basketball players Liav Peled, Neriya Tsur-Shalem and Perez Goldstein, the march into Ramat Gan stadium during the opening ceremonies of next month's Maccabiah Games will be something of a homecoming.

Assistant coach Glen Grunwald, formerly the general manager of the Toronto Raptors, expects it will be "magical" and "something special," while for businessman Gerry Schwartz, one of the Canadian team's honorary chefs de mission, the thought of it brings a smile to his face.

All are key components of the Canadian basketball entry into what promises to be a knock-down, drag 'em out competition in one of the more hotly contested sports at the games.

Peled, Tsur-Shalem and Goldstein are all natives of Israel who have moved to Canada and are continuing their infatuation with the sport. Grunwald, of course, is the high profile assistant coach with an NBA pedigree, while Schwartz, who is a big man in business if not the basketball court, is the guy who has sponsored not only the Canadian basketball team but the entire Maccabiah hoops tournament.

Gerry Schwartz

Grunwald is confident the Canadians will have what it takes to compete in Israel. They're going with the expectation of earning a medal, he said.

Grunwald, who was recruited to the team by senior Maccabi Canada official Sid Greenberg, said the Canadian team has shown a good attitude in practices.

The Canadians will likely adapt their style to the contingencies of play, but for now Grunwald expects them to push the ball in transition to create offence and take good early shots if possible.

"We can run until we get a good shot," Grunwald said, keeping in mind the 24-second clock.

Grunwald expects the Canadian team will get a boost with the participation of big man Alex Bougaieff, whose been playing professionally in Italy for the past five years. Before that, the 6-11 centre played at Rice University in the United States.

Peled, 25, is a native of Petah Tikvah who played in the Maccabi Tel Aviv system for much of his youth. In Israel, professional teams sponsor youth squads in various age groups, he said.

Four years ago, after being spotted at an NCAA evaluation camp in Salt Lake City, Peled was recruited to Alberta, where he was offered a scholarship to play for the Lethbridge College Kodiaks.

"The college offered a scholarship and I took a chance," he said.

A 6-1 point guard with limited knowledge of Canadian geography, Peled at first thought Alberta was a city. He spent three years playing and studying in Lethbridge, where, he surmises, he was likely the only Jew under 80. Last year, he moved to Calgary, where he played for the Southern Alberta Institute of Technology (SAIT) Trojans. He's been a four-time all-star in the Alberta Colleges Athletic Conference.

Studying management with a major in accounting, he learned to enjoy his western Canadian experience and he became, by default, something of a goodwill ambassador for Israel. Often he would be asked to explain the country's security situation, and he would offer inquisitive locals something other than the CNN narrative.

Every year at Rosh Hashanah, the community's remaining octogenarian Jews would open the town's shul and he would be honoured to read from the Torah. He was told his Hebrew inflection was something they hadn't heard in more than 30 years.

It was about one year ago when one of the community members e-mailed him with information about the Maccabiah Games. He subsequently inquired of head coach John Dore whether he could help the team as an assistant, but instead he was asked to come for a tryout. Last August, he made the team.

"Basketball brought me here and basketball is bringing me back," he said on the phone from Calgary, where he's lived for the past year.

The return to Israel will be especially emotional for him, as he hasn't been home in four years. What's more, his sister, Sapir (Sapphire in English), who was 11 when he last saw her, will also participate in the opening ceremonies. She'll be one of the dancers providing entertainment to the thousands of spectators.

"It's exciting," Peled said. "I haven't seen my family for some time."

As for the competition itself, Peled expects a tough grind. Canada will play the United States, France and Moldova in one round robin group, while the other four teams are Israel, Germany, Australia and Brazil.

Canada's first game is versus the United States, whose team is likely to be stocked with NCAA players, he said.

The Israelis, for their part, are sending an all-star team from their elite professional league, some of whom were on the country's under-21 team that finished second in Europe four years ago.

Still, he said, the Canadian team has good talent, good character and a strong work ethic. "It seems like a good team."

Tsur-Shalem, 23, has played for the last four years at Humber College in Toronto. A 6-6 forward, he learned about the games at a shoot-around at his old stomping grounds, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

He's been working out with the rest of the team, many of whom live in the Toronto area.

Practising under Dore and Grunwald has been a satisfying experience, Tsur-Shalem said. "When you first hear about it, it gets you excited. It's good to know you're playing with experienced coaches. It's nice to have them in your corner."

Liav Peled

Dore has been the head coach of Concordia University since the 1989-90 season. He has taken the Stingers to the national championship tournament eight times, winning the national crown in 1990 and placing second in 1995.

Tsur-Shalem expects each Maccabiah game to be intense, even "warlike... Every game is going to be crucial."

With the Humber Hawks, Tsur-Shalem has gotten used to pressure. This past season, the Hawks were crowned Ontario college champions and they finished fourth in all of Canada.

When he first moved to Toronto in high school, it took him a while to adjust to the North American style of play. In Israel, they play a European game, play-based with a high value on shooting accuracy. "People there understand the game, rather than push and dunk. But it's less intense," he said.

Schwartz, meanwhile, will be accompanying the team and expects to sit in on the Canadian games. As the team's – and tournament's – financial sponsor, he has a natural interest in the outcome.

A basketball fan and player since he was a kid, he became involved with the Canadian Maccabiah team thanks to the influence of his friend, filmmaker Robert Lantos. Lantos once participated in the games in water polo and is sponsoring this year's Canadian entry in that competition.

Schwartz said there are many aspects of the Maccabiah Games that attracted him. "It celebrates Jewish athletes from around the world and that's different than the stereotype of Jews bent over and studying. I like that image of strength and vitality."

"It brings young Jewish kids to Israel and exposes them first-hand to Israel, which is always a wonderful experience."

And, he continued, "it's a way to show the Diaspora that Israel is able to hold a major international event. That was more important during the intifadah, but it's still important."

Tikkun olam and kindness

It seems as if everywhere I turn these days, there are strong messages of tikkun olam, in which people of all ages are encouraged to repair the world through acts of social action.

Even The CJN hosted a town hall meeting last month at which a panel of social activists and charitable entrepreneurs talked about how easy it is to make a difference in other people's lives. I left that meeting feeling inspired. After all, I'm young and don't have any real responsibilities yet. I'm at that point in my life where it would be exactly the right time to start something new, something meaningful that could help hundreds around the world. With my head full of ideas and a heart full of humanity, I walked out of the meeting and into the world determined.

By SANDIE BENITAH

But naive little me – it was the real world I walked into.

Today, my heart is hardened and my stomach is turning in disgust. I realized that while some are stitching a bandage over the world's aches, a lot more people are giving a hard kick to just about everybody who crosses their path.

Sounds a little harsh as I'm sure most of us pat ourselves on the back for giving tzedakah and even volunteering some of our time. But please, take a moment to consider this true story.

Two weeks ago, about a hundred people, including patients, doctors, social workers and nurses, were sitting around in a Toronto-area hospital emergency room. A young woman in her 30s walked in, limping, grasping onto overflowing garbage bags full of her possessions with tears streaming down her face.

"I need to use a phone," she screamed. "Help me!"

Patients looked at her with mild interest, momentarily distracted from their own pain. Nobody got up of course. Not even a nurse approached her. After everyone paused for a brief moment, everyone got on with what they were doing.

The woman limped over to the nurse's station, sat down in front of a phone, shaking so badly she couldn't dial. The nurse sitting at the other end of the table barely looked up at her. As her howls continued to draw the stares of onlookers, another nurse quietly spoke to her and told her the hospital was not in the business of helping drug addicts.

"Fine!" screamed the woman, crying so hard she was losing her breath. She wobbled out of the hospital, still clutching on to her bags.

"I'm going to go find a bridge and kill myself."

Everyone sat and stood where they were, quietly watching her leave before turning back to what they were doing.

"The things you see at a hospital," chuckled one woman to her friend, before going back to flipping the pages of her magazine.

I'm not sure whether she was talking about the crying woman or the fact that not one person in the room got up to stop the woman who had just yelled out she was about to commit suicide.

It's easy to look back and shake our head with disbelief but can any of us honestly say we would act any differently? I'm sure each of the hundred people in that room would like to think they'd react differently, too.

Often, when the gesture of tikkun olam is discussed, we talk about ending a plight or finding a solution to a large issue. But as we set out to save the world, it seems as if we're forgetting all about the spirit of kindness. Our kindness doesn't mean much at all if we ignore the man stranded with a flat tire without a cellphone, or the woman struggling with bags of groceries and a quick elevator door. Our kindness didn't mean much at all to the crying woman who walked out of the hospital and onto oncoming traffic.

About Life

Dear Ella

A good friend of mine is marrying off her daughter. I just received the invitation and the wedding is on the long weekend in August.

We all work very hard all year and we only have a handful of weekends we can spend as a family together, and this is one of those weekends. We own a cottage that is very under-utilized. The summer long weekends are very special times for us to get together and catch up with the kids and grandkids. I'll never understand how people can assume that everyone would like to ruin their long summer weekends by being stuck in the city for a four-hour wedding. I would love to decline this invitation, but I'm afraid it would start irreparable bad feelings between us. Do you think I could get away with this?

Untimely Wedding

Dear Untimely Wedding

A wedding is a "simchah," a happy occasion. Simchahs are not meant to cause inconvenience or stress to the invited guests. Unfortunately, having a wedding on one of our few long weekends in the summer is not going to be a popular decision with many people. The family making that kind of decision will have to allow for a larger-than-usual regrets list.

That being said, people invite you to join in their simchah because you are important to them. Weddings are expensive, and guest lists are made with much thought and careful consideration.

I understand that your weekends are important to you, but there are social commitments that we are all required to fulfil from time to time. Perhaps your friend chose this weekend so that her out-of-town guests could also come. Whatever her reasons are, you must weigh the pros and cons of your choices. Maybe you could cut your weekend short at the cottage and enjoy a bit of both events? But whatever you decide, don't do it with resentment. Don't give up your weekend at the cottage and then walk around crabby at the wedding. If you choose to go, enjoy yourself. After all, it's a simchah!

Doctors: a lofty calling

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Maimonidies was one of the greatest Jewish minds ever. He was also the physician of the Saladi, the Egyptian ruler (12th century CE). About health, Maimonides said, "Since maintaining a healthy and sound body is among the ways of God – for one cannot understand or have any knowledge of the Creator if he is ill – therefore he must avoid that which harms the body and accustom himself to that which is helpful and helps the body become stronger."

URBAN WRITER

Maimonides' statement seems to say, maintaining our health is a Godly obligation. If so, it seems logical that those who care for our health are involved in a holy endeavour.

From my own experiences, I have always believed that physicians are frequently special people walking on a sacred path. Of course, parents who want to marry off their children have known this for years.

My introduction to doctors was as a child when our family visited our general practitioner in Elmira, Ont. – the late Dr. Wyatt. The adventure began in the parking lot where we parked next to Mennonite buggies. Once in Dr. Wyatt's office, I saw a giant of a man (actually he was average size) who appeared draped in a white coat with a magical stethoscope hanging around his neck. How curious I was as he listened to the drumbeats of my heart and then peered into my eyes, ears and throat. I remember feeling relieved but safer when he completed his examination, as though I had been repaired by someone with special powers.

Over the years I have been honoured to interact with many physicians and discovered that the characters I once saw as mythical are indeed soulful human beings with masterful skills.

An illustration of this is my personal physician today, Dr. Stephen Gottesman, a truly descent human being with an assuring bedside manner and a progressive approach to medicine. He is a compassionate man who has actualized his commitment to medicine by tending to the elderly in our homes for the aged, as well as impoverished villagers in the rainforests of Guyana.

I have worked with Dr. Howard Price, a specialist – a gastro-enterologist – and former chair of Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee. He is an individual who personifies a deep love of the Jewish people and humankind and his living legacy includes a tenacious commitment to fixing the world. Howard is the co-founder of the Maimonides Society, a United Jewish Appeal affinity group.

I have witnessed the brilliance of Dr. Michael Silverman, of Lakeridge Health Centre, whose academic study in rural Africa has shown that $7 (Cdn) worth of pharmaceuticals can decrease transmission of HIV/AIDS from pregnant mother to child more than 50 per cent of the time.

Doctors often do act as divine assistants. Dr. Carrie Beallor is a prime example. As a tropical medicine doctor she travelled to Sri Lanka following the tsunami to supervise the re-organization of a mother-child clinic. Dr. Rachel Spitzer, a Toronto physician, delivered the much-publicized conjoined Zimbabwean twins and Dr. Sharoni Valin, an effusive native Israeli living in Toronto, developed a family-planning project on a medical mission to South America.

The list of gifted and tender local physicians is lengthy, including Dr. Jay Keystone, a world-renowned travel medicine specialist and Dr. Gordon Arbess, a beautiful man who cares for HIV/AIDS patients and the homeless in downtown Toronto.

Doctors have been kicked around a bit over the years, but at the end of the day we all know they are the ones we turn to when our internal ticking is off or a beloved family member needs to be fixed.

We should be forever grateful to those who chose this demanding vocation, as they are partners with God in the preservation of our health and privy to the secret of the physical and therefore many of the mysteries of the spiritual.

Warmth of Edmonton's Jews helped IAF flyers feel at home

By NEIL LOOMER
Special to The CJN

EDMONTON — A six-week adventure for Edmonton's Jewish community came to an end June 24 with the conclusion of Exercise Maple Flag, the international air combat exercises held annually at 4 Wing Base in Cold Lake, Alta.

Israeli contingent was in Alberta for air combat exercises

This year, for the first time, Israeli forces joined pilots and technicians from Belgium, Germany, France, Britain, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Singapore, Sweden, the United States and Canada.

Israel's contribution included about 150 Israeli Air Force (IAF) personnel, 10 F-16's and a 707 tanker, which was used to refuel the fighter jets on the 10,000-kilometre flight from Israel to Alberta via the Azores and Bangor, Maine.

The Cold Lake range, located about 294 kilometres northeast of Edmonton, gives pilots 11,000 square kilometres of space for realistic training in a modern simulated air combat environment.

For Alberta's capital, the closest centre with a Jewish community, this meant a non-stop series of visits by high-ranking Israeli military officials and diplomats, in addition to IAF personnel taking part in the exercises.

Yom Hazikaron services took on additional meaning this year with the presence of two Israeli airmen who participated in a flag-lowering ceremony. Two days later, the community celebrated one of its most spirited Yom Ha'atzmauts ever, as 60 Israeli pilots and support personnel came down from Cold Lake for a dinner and concert featuring some of Israel's most popular singers, Yardena Arazi and Hanan and Shira Yovel.

For the Israelis, many of whom had never been so far from home, it was an opportunity to celebrate with new friends and feel the warmth that the Diaspora holds for Israel. With little to do in Cold Lake, many took the 3½-hour drive to Edmonton to enjoy shopping, sightseeing and nightlife, and many received home hospitality while in Alberta's capital.

Arrangements were also made with kosher food suppliers in Edmonton to provide the base's mess hall with meat and other meals for observant personnel.

A Maccabiah first: Canada to compete in soccer

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For the first time since anyone can remember, Canada is sending a men's outdoor soccer team to the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Wish them luck.

The Canadians couldn't have picked a tougher draw for the first round of competition if they'd done it themselves. Canada will face the Netherlands, the United States and Argentina, three soccer powerhouses, and they could also face Israel if they manage to advance to the second round. How's that for jumping into the deep end?

Co-coach Salim Brahimi expects "stiff competition," but the team is travelling to Israel with the "intention of doing well."

He and Adam Mar, the team's other coach, have designed a game plan to neutralize opponents' strengths and take advantage of Canada's ability to strike quickly.

Brahimi, who is assistant coach for the McGill University Redmen, said the Canadian team will be "very disciplined," with an emphasis on positional play and leaving no gaps open.

"As much as possible, we will play an airtight defence and counterattack," he said.

"That requires a lot of discipline and an understanding of where to be on the field."

The 17th Maccabiah Games run in Israel from July 10 to 21.

The Canadian soccer team will rely heavily on its strength – "three terrific [goal]keepers" and strong forwards, Brahimi said.

In net, he and Mar, who serves as head coach of the Redmen, can choose from among Colin Berenhaut and Tomer Chencinski, who both have played for NCAA Division I schools, and Sean Kane, who suits up for the North York Astros of the Canadian Professional Soccer League (CPSL). Berenhaut attended George Washington University in Washington,

Shul's School Certified

TORONTO — The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism has recognized Beit Rayim Synagogue's Hebrew school as a "Framework for Excellence School," making it the first supplementary school in Canada to receive this certification. Certified schools must meet "rigorous standards in family education, curriculum development and professional development," and use "formal and informal educational programming to enhance students' Jewish education," the Richmond Hill, Ont., shul said.

WORLD

Kenyans Acquitted

NAIROBI — Three Kenyans were acquitted of involvement in the November 2002 bombing of an Israeli-owned hotel. The High Court in Nairobi ruled June 27 that there is insufficient evidence to link the defendants, all Muslims, to the suicide attack in Mombasa that killed 12 Israelis and three hotel staffers. An earlier case involving four other defendants also ended in acquittal. Al Qaeda claimed responsibility for the bombing and for a simultaneous attempt to shoot down an Israeli airliner taking off from a nearby airport. No one has been charged in the latter case.

Pizzeria Attacked

PARIS — After being caught stealing, local Arab and African youths gathered to throw bottles at clients of a kosher pizzeria in Paris on June 20. A witness said several youths stole a cellphone off a table at a nearby café and were running by La Marina pizzeria when a customer gave chase. He retrieved the phone, but the youths returned five minutes later. Police made a number of arrests and several people received minor wounds. One of the arrested youths came back to the eatery a few days later and threatened to kill a man who filed charges against him.

Adviser Named

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Air Force last week named ex-U.S. Navy chaplain Rabbi Arnold Resnicoff as a special assistant in response to charges of proselytizing at the Air Force Academy. He helped create a program at the Colorado Springs campus to deal with religious tolerance. The school has been criticized recently for creating an uncomfortable climate for religious minorities, including Jewish cadets, who said they felt pressure to choose their duties over expressing their religion.

Watchdog Appointed

LONDON — The BBC appointed award-winning journalist Jeremy Bowen as its first-ever Middle East editor to oversee its coverage of the region. The BBC's coverage has been fiercely criticized by some for an anti-Israel bias. Bowen, 45, a correspondent in Jerusalem from 1995 to 2000, will provide analysis and commentary on the situation. Before taking up the post, he met Jewish community leaders to discuss the BBC's coverage.

Nazis Outnumbered

YORKTOWN, Va. — Protesters outnumbered participants at a June 25 Nazi rally in Yorktown, Va. Some 500 protesters showed up at a historic battlefield in Yorktown, Va., to oppose 150 Nazi Party members seeking to honour founding U.S. president George Washington, who they say believed in racial segregation. Historians say he did not.

Adios to Hezbollah

MADRID — Spain ordered its satellite broadcaster to pull Hezbollah's TV affiliate from its Latin American service. Last week's order to state-controlled Hispasat to remove al-Manar from its broadcasts comes after French and U.S. decisions last year to remove the station from signals to Europe and North America. Al-Manar raises funds for the Lebanese terror group and broadcasts anti-Semitic libels.

Globe Issues Correction to Summit Story

TORONTO — The Globe and Mail issued a correction for errors in an article on last month's Israeli-Palestinian summit.

The Globe issued the correction for reporting that the June 21 meeting between Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas took place on "disputed home turf" in Sharon's "flag-draped residence in the Muslim Quarter of Jerusalem's Old City." The meeting was actually held in Sharon's residence in west Jerusalem.

The Globe's June 22 report came from freelance reporter Carolynne Wheeler, who devoted two paragraphs to describing Sharon's residence in east Jerusalem, which she said "remains a stinging symbol for Palestinians." Wheeler, who is married to Mark MacKinnon, the Globe's full-time Israel correspondent, also described participants at the meeting as "grim-faced," although she was not there.

"Obviously, it's a very embarrassing error," the Globe's interim foreign editor, Guy Nicholson, told the Jerusalem Post. "We asked [Wheeler] for some background about where the story location was. Unfortunately, she was not actually at the scene of it. She wrote it off of television and wires."

Israel, Canada part of high tech partnership

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Relations between Canada and Israel entered a new phase with Ottawa's announcement last month of a partnership aimed at promoting collaborative high-tech research and development with India, China, Brazil and Israel.

The creation of the International Science and Technology Partnerships Program – funded by $20 million over five years – puts Israel in a select group of booming economies with great potential, enthused Henri Rothschild, president of the Ottawa-based Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF).

Rothschild has much to smile about. He believes the new agreement is modelled on the success CIIRDF has encountered since its creation in 1994 to promote joint R&D between Israeli and Canadian firms, primarily in the high-tech sector.

In April, the mandate of CIIRDF was renewed for another five years with the visit to Canada of Ehud Olmert, Israel's deputy premier. At the same time, Olmert signed a memorandum of understanding with Ontario to work jointly in a number of scientific, industrial and technological areas.

The newest partnership "is a major development," Rothschild told The CJN. "It's one of the best validations of Canada-Israel relations we have."

Ties with Israel have been generally viewed in Ottawa within the context of the larger Middle East conflict, Rothschild noted. This agreement, which represents countries with a combined 2.5 billion people, "creates an environment that's more economic than political. For the first time, Canada-Israel bilateral relations are also seen from [the viewpoint] of trade and commercial relations.

"We have taken Canada-Israel relations to a whole new level."

He said the deal marks the first time Canada has allocated public funds to an international program that will promote multilateral co-operation in science and technology.

Funding for the initiative was contained in the 2005 federal budget. The money is expected to begin flowing this autumn.

Israel is now among a select group of countries that are among Canada's highest priorities, Rothschild said, noting that the red-hot economies of China and India could yield huge windfalls for the Jewish state.

A joint statement from International Trade Minister Jim Peterson and Industry Minister David Emerson explained that the program "will foster and support bilateral research projects between Canada and partner countries that have been proposed by companies and universities. It will also stimulate bilateral science and technology networking and match-making activities to further new partnerships and accelerate the commercialization of research and development."

Israel is especially well positioned to benefit, Rothschild said.

"Israel is one of the best partners in the world from which to gain experience on technological partnerships because it has such superb technology and a globally positioned business and research community. It's one of the most connected countries in the world. If you learn through partnerships with Israel, you can apply that to India and China."

At 4.8 per cent of its gross domestic product, Israel has the highest rate of investment in R&D in the world.

Areas covered in the partnership include biotechnology, aerospace technology, the environment, nanotechnology, energy and information, and communications technology.

Amid the flurry of economic activity between Israel and Canada was the visit last month by representatives of eight Israeli venture capital firms to Toronto and Montreal, resulting in projects that could reach values of between $50 million and $100 million.

Rothschild said Israel is looking to establish more collaborative projects with other Canadian provinces. In Atlantic Canada, Israel is said to be examining connecting its capabilities in unmanned air vehicles to the maintenance of offshore oil and gas systems.

Trust is essential

From the editor's desk

Because reporters are human, errors creep into our work. Even objectivity – in the genuine, scientific sense of the term – is impossible for reporters to achieve. The human condition simply does not allow for it.

Mature readers of a newspaper understand this. They therefore do not expect perfection in newspapers and errorless reporting of the news. Rather, readers expect honesty and fairness in reporting, the minimum qualities on which integrity and trust are founded.

When it comes to Israel, alas, reporting is often less than honest and less than fair. Personal hostility toward the Jewish state sometimes colours the facts that are represented as news. This has been more typically the case in Europe than in North America and certainly, in Canada.

Last month, the Wall Street Journal published an essay by Tom Gross titled "J'accuse: Anti-Semitism at Le Monde and Beyond," in which he explored the troubling phenomenon of the anti-Israel bias in some European print media. Gross used a groundbreaking ruling of a French court that found three writers for Le Monde and the newspaper's publisher guilty of "racist defamation" against Israel and the Jewish people, as a jumping-off point for an exposition on European media coverage of Israel.

His conclusions are upsetting.

"Responsible journalists strenuously avoid libelous characterizations of entire ethnic, national or religious groups," Gross wrote. "The exception to this seems to be the coverage of Jews, particularly Israeli ones…"

"If the misreporting and bias were limited to one or two newspapers or television program in each country, it might be possible to shrug them off. But they are not. Bashing Israel even extends to local papers that don't usually cover foreign affairs…"

In a recent lecture in Toronto (reported in The CJN last week) veteran Jerusalem correspondent Matthew Kalman shed some light on why news coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict can so often be so flawed.

He identified a number of archetypes of reporters and reporting services and the specific accuracy failings that accompanies each. For example, Kalman cited, what he called the "parachutist," a reporter taken straight from the airport to the site of the story who usually "hasn't the faintest idea what's going on." And yet he or she files an authoritative story whose facts, the reader assumes, are reliable. In these "parachuted" circumstances surrounding the filing of the story – when it is written by someone lacking in requisite knowledge of background, context, or the more complex details of history – it is not surprising when the accuracy of the story is questionable.

Sometimes even bare, uncomplicated facts of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict are misreported.

Such was the case two weeks ago in a story in the Globe and Mail. The error was so unusual that a story about the error appeared in The Jerusalem Post and JTA and has now even been the subject of an Internet report by HonestReporting.

Freelancer Carolynne Wheeler filed a story from Jerusalem about the summit meeting in Jerusalem between Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestine Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Wheeler wrote that "Palestinian leaders left the meeting in Mr. Sharon's flag-draped residence in the Muslim Quarter of Jerusalem's Old City grim-faced, appearing only briefly before reporters in Ramallah to announce their disappointment."

In fact, the meeting between the two leaders did not take place in "Sharon's flag-draped residence in the Muslim Quarter of Jerusalem's Old City," as Wheeler reported. The meeting took place in the prime minister's official residence in Rehavia, in west Jerusalem.

As far as I have been able to discern, no other reporter anywhere reported that the Sharon-Abbas meeting took place in east Jerusalem. But the error was compounded by Wheeler's two-paragraph-long political commentary in the middle of her story regarding "this meeting of just under three hours," which she erroneously reported "was held on disputed home turf." Wheeler added that the building "remains a stinging symbol for Palestinians struggling to hold onto Arab neighbourhoods in east Jerusalem."

The Globe published a correction the next day, setting the record straight that the meeting "took place in the official prime minister's residence in the Rehavia neighbourhood." There was also a sense in the correction that the editors were uncomfortable with the unsubtle implication from the reference by Wheeler to "disputed home turf." The correction included a statement that the east Jerusalem home "was purchased from its Arab occupants in 1987."

Guy Nicholson, the Globe's interim foreign editor, told the Jerusalem Post that Wheeler "wrote [the story] off of television and wires." But this cannot be true since no wire service appears to have reported the meeting as having happened in east Jerusalem. Israeli television would have certainly not reported that.

Neither the Globe's perfunctory correction nor the dangling excuse by Nicholson is satisfactory, let alone persuasive. The paper's usually high standards were egregiously compromised by Wheeler. The nature of her error combined with the gratuitously negative commentary about the east Jerusalem home suggest there was more at play in the reporter's work than sloppy inattention to detail. How can readers trust her reporting again?

We need the Globe to be trustworthy and reliable. Its handling of the flawed story by Wheeler falls far below the standards that will ensure that trustworthiness.

SHARON MAY SPEAK IN TORONTO:

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, centre, has been invited to be the keynote speaker at this year's General Assembly of United Jewish Communities (GA) in Toronto. The invitation was extended by international GA co-chair Julia Koschitzky, second from right, who recently met with Sharon in Jerusalem. Sharon said he would make every effort to be at the GA, to be held in Toronto Nov. 13 to 15. Some 4,000 delegates are expected at the GA, which is taking place in Toronto for the first time in more than 20 years. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has so far recruited about 360 of the 700 volunteers needed to run the conference. Pictured with Sharon and Koschitzky are, from left, incoming UIA Federations Canada president Stanley Plotnick, UIAFC executive director Maxyne Finkelstein and outgoing UIAFC president David Goldstein.

Federation chair wants to foster leadership

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"If you have the ability to give back, you give back," said David Engel. "And if you believe in issues and causes, as I do, and somebody asks you to get involved, you don't say no. You say yes."

The new chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, a 49-year-old business owner who succeeded Leslie Gales on June 8, first became involved in Jewish communal work in his native Montreal when he and his wife Judy were asked to join a Young Leadership couples program.

They continued their involvement in the Toronto community when they moved here 21 years ago.

Today, fostering leadership is one of the priorities Engel has set for his two-year term at the lay helm of what he said is the largest umbrella organization of its kind in North America.

"If you have stronger leaders, you have stronger agencies. We're in the business of community building," he said in an interview in his office at Innovative Graphics, the direct marketing company he launched 10 years ago.

"People told me to pick three priorities [as chair]," said Engel, a winner of several Jewish communal leadership awards. However, he concluded that seven items deserved priority:

- the federation's relationship with Israel and the broader Jewish community in Canada;
- Jewish education;
- fostering leadership in the federation and its agencies;
- the upcoming General Assembly of United Jewish Communities, which will be held in Toronto in November;
- the new community campus being built in Vaughan as part of the federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) initiative;
- the elderly; and
- furthering dialogue with agencies about communal issues and trends.

During his term as chair, there will be two new committees, both of which are in the process of being set up. One will deal with education, the other with issues related to providing social services and Jewish programming to the elderly.

The federation will examine what its role should be in terms of ensuring accessibility to quality Jewish education, said Engel, whose three children – now 23, 21 and 17, all attended Jewish day school.

Despite challenges like the high cost of Jewish education, he noted, Toronto is seen as "one of the shining lights" of Jewish education in North America.

As to the question of whether the $250 million JTT project further squeezes budgets for pressing needs including those related to education, Engel offered a different perspective.

He said studies in American Jewish communities have shown that "people who make a capital gift actually get more involved in the community and tend to give greater sums to the annual campaign – and it's happening here.

"People don't necessarily have the same desire to donate to non-capital needs," he said.

David Engel

The Vaughan project is an investment, said Engel. "We have to make sure as we develop that campus that it's accessible to the entire community. We have to make certain the community is aware of it and that the services are what's needed, and at the same time make sure we're fiscally responsible."

Both the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (formerly the Bloor JCC) and the new Wolfond Centre for Jewish Student Life – the first stage of JTT and a revitalization of the Jewish community downtown – are "booming" centres, he pointed out. "Was it the right investment? Absolutely."

Engel, who also serves as secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Marketing Association, said he gets back "far more" than he puts in as a community volunteer.

"I want to be an example that community work is accessible to all, and that you can run a business, be a parent and husband and be involved in the community all at the same time," said Engel, who stays fit by running.

He credits his parents for their example as volunteers, and also the values he learned as a student at the Jewish People's and Peretz Schools in Montreal.

JNF embodies eco-Zionism: national president

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Sharon Hart, new national president of Jewish National Fund, took part in her first JNF Tu b'Shvat telethon in honour of her mother's birthday.

"My mother was born on Tu b'Shvat so when my Na'mat chapter was approached to take part in the telethon, I thought it would be a special thing to do. I never looked back," says Hart, who is taking over for Sandy Posluns, who served a four-year term.

Hart, a physician and her husband, Lawrence, associate professor of medicine at McMaster University, are past honorees of Hamilton's annual Negev Dinner.

Originally from Montreal, she has served as national vice-president of JNF Canada, was national chair of JNF's centennial committee, and represented Canada at JNF's world conference in Jerusalem. In 1998, she was awarded the Bernard Bloomfield Medal for Meritorious Service.

Her husband, a Canadian Jewish News columnist, is national president of Maccabi Canada and community relations chair of Canada-Israel Committee.

Sharon Hart

Hart says she has remained involved with JNF because "it embodies the Zionist ideal. It is the number one Zionist organization in Canada and maybe the world. Taking care of the land is something very special; people of all ages can relate to it."

Children, she says, develop their imaginations when they picture their tree as part of a huge forest in Israel. "To teenagers, ecology is an important concept and JNF embodies eco-Zionism, the balance between ecology and Zionism. JNF works in way that is sensitive to the environment.

"Adults relate to JNF because it is on the cutting edge of technology and it allows them to earn a living in an environment without harming it."

With about 220 million trees planted, she says, "Israel is the only country in the world that had more trees at the end of the century than at the beginning. It is natural that when we think of the organization we think of these trees, and also of [the JNF blue collections boxes]. JNF, however, is about a lot more than that."

Among the organization's many projects, it is involved in desalinating water, building reservoirs to save water, landscaping and development, paving roads, soil conservation, a number of tourism and recreation projects, and educational programs.

"No one turns on a tap in Israel without thinking of JNF. The Sea of Galilee is [one of the] only sources of fresh water in the country, and as the population increases, stress on the water system is high," she said.

Part of the organization's vision is to make the desert livable. "It covers about 60 per cent of the country's land mass, yet only eight per cent of the population lives there.

"[In order to attract people] JNF has to prepare the land – flatten the soil, bring in sewage and gas lines, build roads, and then build water reservoirs so farmers will have water."

Hart says that to her, "JNF is about a partnership between the people. It is an organization that connects all of us. Every person who puts a cent in the blue box – it is coming up on its 100th anniversary – is a partner. We're all partners in the land, and JNF is the caretaker."

During her term, which is renewable after two years, Hart wants to "rebrand JNF. We want people to realize that it is on the cutting edge of what is environmentally important."

She is planning a national mission to Israel in late October, in which participants will see JNF's work first-hand, she says.

Iran, again

Was it only a coincidence that merely days after Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was elected president of Iran, a band of Hezbollah terrorists infiltrated into the Har Dov area of northern Israel? A series of firefights ensued with Israel Defence Forces soldiers who spotted them. IDF Cpl. Uzi Peretz, 20, from Be'er Sheva, was killed, and three Israeli soldiers were wounded in the engagement, which included mortar shelling by Hezbollah upon the Israeli army positions. The Israeli air force struck at Hezbollah bases in South Lebanon on Thursday afternoon.

Hezbollah are Iran's surrogate fighters against Israel, and the theocratic rulers of the Iranian republic are not reluctant to let loose their fundamentalist Lebanese Shia proxies upon the Jewish state whenever they deem that to do so serves Iranian interests.

The attack on Israel last week was probably a message from Iran's ruling clique that Ahmadinejad – known as a religious hardliner – would maintain the country's hostile policies toward the Jewish state. "I will strive to expand relations with everyone, with the exception of Israel," Ahmadinejad told the Saudi newspaper Okaz after his election. He also vowed to continue his country's fevered nuclear program although vaguely expressing his intention to resume efforts with European intermediaries to come to an agreement over the issue.

Not surprisingly, Israel is concerned. The Islamic rulers of Iran are unalterably opposed to a sovereign Jewish presence in the Middle East and are at the heart of the Islamic world's efforts to sabotage any peaceful accommodation between Israelis and Palestinians.

After Ahmadinejad's election, Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom urged the international community to strengthen its resolve against Iranian efforts to develop a nuclear arsenal. "The results prove once again that Iran is moving towards more radicalism rather than toward reform and reconciliation. Faced with the Iranian nuclear threat, the international community must, more than before, formulate a uniform and stern policy toward Iran," Shalom said.

Last week, the U.S. administration announced that it was investigating whether the Iranian president-elect was involved in the 1979 seizure of the American Embassy in Tehran. A number of the former hostages have identified Ahmadinejad as one of the key leaders in the embassy takeover some 26 years ago. "Obviously his involvement raises many questions," President George W. Bush told reporters.

One of those questions must be how the western world will respond to Iran's worrisome Islamist policies. It is not only Israel that is at risk. Indeed, it is not only the West that is at risk. The Sunni sheikhs of Saudi Arabia should also be concerned.

The powers of the Iranian president are subordinate to those of the religious rulers. He has no truly independent authority. However, given that Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is a mirror reflecting back to the world the severe image of Iran's mullah world, we must all play close attention.

25 years ago in The CJN

• Shimon Peres, the leader of Israel's opposition Labor Party, told a news conference in Montreal that resolving the status of the Gaza Strip was the key to salvaging negotiations between Israel and Egypt.

• Canadian Jewish Congress struck a committee to study the educational, cultural, religious and financial needs of Jews in small communities.

• Rabbi Shalom Messas, Sephardi chief rabbi of Jerusalem, arrived for a two-week visit to the Jewish communities of Montreal and Toronto. It was his first trip to Canada.

The Canadian Jewish community is lost

It pained me to read your editorial about supporting the Israeli government at all costs ("Disengagement and the Diaspora," June 30) I don't think there's any use in explaining further how I feel, since it's already apparent from the editorial direction that The CJN has taken vis-a-vis the "disengagement" that no one will change your mind.

I just thought it very, very suitable that in the editorial, you reaffirm your support for the expulsion of Jews from Gush Katif by an illegitimate government, and in the same issue, you report that immigration is the "key to growth of the Canadian Jewish community" ("Immigrants account for small rise in Jewish population").

Thank you for both the editorial and the article. It reinforces my decision to make aliyah 12 years ago. The Canadian Jewish community is lost and desperately trying to hang on. But hang on to what? It's time to move to Israel before it's too late. At least for your children and grandchildren, if not yourselves.

Apology to Pipes removed from website

In your June 23 edition, you noted that the Canadian Islamic Congress had issued an apology in its June 10 Friday Bulletin for publishing an article in a previous Friday Bulletin that compared U.S. commentator Daniel Pipes to Hitler and said he wanted to ethnically cleanse Muslims from America ("Muslim group apologizes for Hitler slur"). However, you did not note that the Canadian Islamic Congress has since removed that apology from its website. It would be interesting to know their reasons for removing this apology and retraction. Have they since changed their minds about it?

NIF supports anti-Israel organizations

Paul Lungen's article on the New Israel Fund ("New Israel Fund backs Gaza disengagement," CJN, June 9) and Isser Dubinsky's response ("NIF backs gov't disengagement decision," letter, June 23) both ignore the true nature of the NIF's activities. As the NGO Monitor website reported as recently as March 10, the NIF still supports radically anti-Israel organizations like Adalah and HaMoked, which engage in legal actions and invective that endanger the Jewish people. In fact, the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, an organization that Dubinsky boasts about in his letter, spends large sums of money fighting against the separation barrier, a measure that experts agree has helped substantially decrease suicide bombings in Israel. Furthermore, according to the NGO Monitor, the organizations supported by the NIF routinely release reports that call Israel's policies "racist" and accuse Israel of countless crimes, including "war crimes" in Jenin and Nablus.

Dubinsky claims that the NIF promotes "democracy, pluralism, social and economic justice and civil rights." These ideals are in this case merely code words for the demonization of Israel. It is profoundly disturbing that an organization with so much potential and money does not have the moral sense to distinguish between promoting anti-Semitism and promoting democracy. Of course, the NIF would likely argue that what it considers the positive activities of some of the NGOs it supports outweigh the negative. That argument sounds eerily similar to the argument used by the European Union to justify support for some other "organizations," namely Hamas and Hezbollah, which also provide welfare assistance, medical care and other "humanitarian" activities. Just as we do not make excuses for these terror groups, accordingly, decent people in the Jewish community should certainly refrain from supporting the NIF as well.

Redirect funds for buildings to education

You reported that United Synagogue Day School, Eitz Chaim, and other day schools are experiencing declining enrolment ("USDS to consolidate its three campuses" and "Eitz Chaim to merge with Thornhill Talmud Torah," CJN, June 9). In the USDS article was the comment that one of the contributing factors is a tuition fee of $10,000. In the same issue, you had a column about the Ontario Liberal government continuing in its refusal to contribute funds to faith-based schools ("We can't forget what the Liberals did").

The $10,000 fee is simply too onerous for parents to make the commitment to pay these large amounts for many years of schooling, often for several children, and they have decided not to send their children to day schools. If the Ontario government refuses to contribute, then the Jewish community will have to redirect its own funds instead. If we can raise hundreds of millions of dollars for fancy new buildings, why can't we do the same for the people for whom these institutions are being built?

AN APPRECIATION

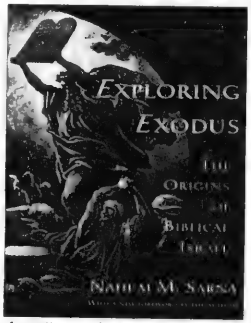
Nahum Sarna set the course for meaningful biblical scholarship

By JEFFREY H. TIGAY

The death on June 23 of Prof. Nahum Sarna at the age of 82 was a sad moment for Jewish scholarship.

Through his publications, his teaching and the disciples he inspired and trained, Rabbi Sarna was one of the most influential Judaic scholars of the second half of the 20th century and one whose contribution to the appreciation of the Bible among English-speaking Jews was unsurpassed.

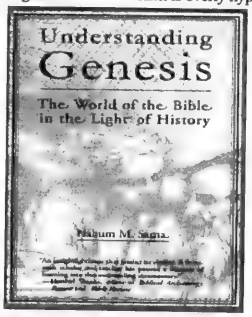
His scholarship was notable for the lucidity of his thought, the breadth of his learning, his exegetical acumen and his unsurpassed sensitivity to the ethical and spiritual dimensions of the Bible and its commentaries.



Rabbi Sarna was a distinguished member of a small group of American and Israeli scholars who guided Jewish biblical scholarship to maturity in the second half of the 20th century. As he noted in the preface to his book, Studies in Biblical Interpretation, two of the major stimuli for the growth of modern Jewish biblical scholarship have been "research into the languages, literatures, history, religions, cultures and archeology of the ancient Near East" and creative research into the rich Jewish exegetical tradition. Rabbi Sarna and his contemporaries united these two resources in a harmonious blend that is common, even if not universal, today.

Yet, this was not always the case.

When the Judische Wissenschaft (Jewish Scholarship) movement inaugurated the academic study of Judaism in the 19th century, it avoided biblical studies altogether. When Jewish academic scholars did take up the study of the Bible, starting at the end of that century, they were largely stimulated by archeology and Semitic studies. Most of them made little use of post-biblical Jewish resources, such as Talmud and the medieval Jewish commentators, in their exposition of the Bible.



It was Rabbi Sarna and his contemporaries, thoroughly trained in post-biblical Judaica as well as ancient Near Eastern languages and literatures, who showed how illuminating this combination of fields can be.

It is not only that post-biblical learning provides one more resource for understanding the Bible's original meaning, though that is a very important aspect of their methodology. It is a broader vision of what Jewish biblical scholarship should embrace: not only the Bible's original meaning, but the meaning found in it by later thinkers who used commentary on scripture as the means of expressing the moral, religious, philosophical and scientific truths discovered in every generation.

The study of the Bible as "a spiritual exercise" and "a moral training" was a pervasive theme in Rabbi Sarna's writings. Repeatedly, he showed how God's morality is inherent in the monotheistic idea and how, as he wrote, the corollary, that "there is an intimate, in fact, inextricable connection between the socio-moral condition of a people and its ultimate fate," underlies the biblical interpretation of history.

Rabbi Sarna's scholarship was characterized by a strong literary orientation, ferreting out the unifying compositional strategies, recurring motifs and structure of the biblical text as he explicated it. These aims helped explain his reservations about the usefulness of source criticism, the scholarly method that seeks to identify earlier literary sources used in the composition of biblical books.

He certainly recognized the validity of the method in principle. Nor did Rabbi Sarna see this as a problem for religious faith. God can work through four documents as effectively as through one, unfolding His revelation in successive stages as well as in a single moment of time. But parting company with much contemporary scholarship, Rabbi Sarna became increasingly convinced – apparently as he began writing his commentaries – that source criticism is overly hypothetical and of limited value, and that what the final text says is more interesting than its history.

Hence, his commentaries are not based on "dissecting a literary corpse," but are concerned with, as he wrote, the Bible as "a living literature and a dynamic force in history."

Rabbi Sarna's approach to scholarship was his distillation of educational experiences that began as far back as he could remember. He was born in London on March 27, 1923, to Jacob and Millie Sarna. His father, a learned Jewish book dealer who knew the German classics as well as Jewish literature, filled his home with books. Rabbi Sarna was taught Bible stories from a young age. His father was also a Zionist leader and as a youngster, Rabbi Sarna met Jewish leaders and scholars such as Chaim Weizmann, Vladimir Jabotinsky, Moses Gaster and Benjamin Maisler (Mazar) who visited his home.

While in elementary school, Rabbi Sarna also attended an intensive Talmud Torah (after-hours Hebrew school) for some 13 hours a week. He later attended London's all-day Jewish Secondary School, which taught both Jewish and secular studies, and he spent an additional two hours a day studying Talmud at a yeshiva. At age 16, he graduated from the University of London, where he studied rabbinics, Semitics and Bible in Jews' College (London's Rabbinical Seminary, then a part of the university), general studies at University College, and medieval Hebrew and Arabic in the School of Oriental and African Studies.

Nahum Sarna

In 1947, he married Helen Horowitz, whom he met when the two were teenagers in a religious Zionist youth movement. He was her first Hebrew teacher, and she went on to become a learned Hebraist and Judaica librarian and to maintain an active involvement in all of Rabbi Sarna's work. The Sarnas' sons David and Jonathan were born, respectively, in 1949 and 1955.

During his student years Rabbi Sarna's main field was rabbinic literature, and he had a particular interest in the Geonic literature of the post-talmudic period. But after receiving his bachelor's degree and being appointed as an instructor (later lecturer) of Hebrew and Bible at University College, he began to realize that one could not do justice to the Bible without a first-hand knowledge of the literatures and cultures of biblical Israel's ancient Near Eastern neighbors.

Hoping to study these subjects, he went to Israel in 1949, but conditions at the Hebrew University immediately after the War of Independence made this impossible. In 1951, he came to the United States to continue his studies at Philadelphia's Dropsie College, where he received his doctorate in 1955.

While studying at Dropsie, Rabbi Sarna taught at Philadelphia's Gratz College and also became the first of several distinguished scholars-in-residence at Har Zion Temple. In 1957, his broad knowledge of Jewish literature led to his simultaneous appointments as a member of the Bible department and as librarian at the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary of America in New York. In 1965, he accepted an appointment at Brandeis University, where he served as the Dora Golding Professor of Bible until his retirement in 1985.

Many of the students he taught at each of these institutions went on to become rabbis, educators, and professors of Judaic studies at various universities in the United States and Israel.

After his retirement Rabbi Sarna served for several years as the academic consultant of the Jewish Publication Society. Following a move to Boca Raton, Fla., both Sarnas were called out of retirement to help develop Florida Atlantic University's Judaic studies program.

Ever the pedagogue, one of the most important aspects of Rabbi Sarna's scholarly career has been his devotion to scholarly projects that serve Jewish communal needs. All of his books have been written with lay as well as scholarly readers in mind. Understanding Genesis (1966), originally published by the Jewish Theological Seminary's Melton Research Center for Jewish Education, was written to inform Bible teachers about modern scholarship on Genesis.

Its appeal turned out to be much broader, leading to its republication by Schocken and setting the pattern for Exploring Exodus (1986) and the more recent Songs of the Heart: An Introduction to the Book of Psalms.

When Understanding Genesis was published, I felt that if there was one book about the Bible that I could put in the hands of every college student, that would be it. Each subsequent book of his left me with the same feeling!

From 1966 to 1981, Rabbi Sarna served, along with Moshe Greenberg, and Jonas C. Greenfield, on the committee that translated the Writings (Ketuvim) for the Jewish Publication Society's Tanakh: The Holy Scriptures (1982).

In 1973, Rabbi Sarna and Chaim Potok initiated the five-volume JPS Torah Commentary (1989-96), for which Rabbi Sarna served as the scholarly editor and author of the commentaries on Genesis and Exodus.

In an interesting twist of history, an abridged version of the JPS Torah Commentary was published in 2001 as part of the Conservative movement's one-volume Torah commentary Etz Hayim to replace the venerable Pentateuch and Haftorahs edited by Joseph H. Hertz. Rabbi Sarna was brought up on Hertz's commentary, and Hertz was the chief rabbi of the British Empire and president of Jews' College when Rabbi Sarna was a student there 60 years earlier.

Throughout his life, Rabbi Sarna was honoured in many ways for his contributions to scholarship, winning numerous scholarly awards and honorary doctorates. No scholar has done as much to educate English-speaking Jewry about the Bible, and he did so in the conviction that intelligent readers prefer serious scholarship lucidly presented over popularizing simplifications. The response to his books has proven him correct.

Jeffrey H. Tigay is Ellis Professor of Hebrew and Semitic languages and literatures at the University of Pennsylvania. This piece was adapted from the foreword he wrote to Rabbi Sarna's 2000 book Studies in Biblical Interpretation.

The challenge of truth-telling

We all know we're supposed to tell the truth. "No lying" are the words I told my grandchildren recently, just as I had taught their parents so many years ago.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

It's clear and obvious to us as a moral imperative. Yet I find two related problems embedded in this principle. Sometimes, we cannot or should not reveal the truth, and sometimes we are incapable of revealing the truth to ourselves.

On the one hand, there are truly moments when it's inappropriate to tell the truth, or when the truth has many facets. All brides are beautiful no matter what. That truth overwhelms any particular reality.

I'm sure we can all think of moments when we chose a non-truth – that little white lie– over a bold-faced fact because we didn't want to hurt anyone. But this is truly the slippery slope. Recently, a young student asked me which of the Ten Commandments or Jewish laws I had violated. In response to her personal honesty and innocence, I felt the need to respond truthfully. So I told her I had lied many times, and probably would continue to do so. I then tried to absolve myself of culpability by pointing out that sometimes it's appropriate to lie.

But I heard the apologetics in my response and I knew I had transgressed. Yes, there were times when it was important not to tell the truth. But I think we must still acknowledge the trespass and worry about the ease with which we excuse expanding the arena of "must-tell lies."

And what do our children learn when we tell a lie? At dinnertime, the phone rings and we say, "Tell them I'm not home." What have the kids absorbed? Just think of the many "appropriate lies" we have all told. So, although we readily agree to the fundamental principle, truth-telling is not so easy.

But the second problem worries me even more. There is a sentence in the siddur that we recite every morning: one should acknowledge truth and speak (i.e., think) truth in one's heart. I have long wondered if that's possible. Not only are we commanded to tell the truth, but to acknowledge it fully, we must acknowledge it internally. I guess I think that to never lie to oneself is the hardest thing to do. No coverup, no justification, just the truth. Know it, face it and hold it dear. In all circumstances.

Psychologically, we have an incredible capacity for self-delusion. So this small sentence, recited every morning as we embark on a day full of complex activities and speech acts, tries to remind us to be honest to ourselves. That's the challenge.

Learning to live in two worlds

I've been in Damascus three times – twice in Syria, and once in Toronto.

I have travelled to Syria twice, and I got to see the original Dura Europa synagogue frescoes. Readers may have seen reproductions in the Museum of the Diaspora, but I consider it a highlight of my travels to have seen the real thing .

But my third trip to Damascus was through the recent film Sabah: A Love Story, starring Arsinée Khanjian, wife of Canadian filmmaker Atom Egoyan. Its story is simple, its meaning complex.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Sabah is a 40-year-old Syrian Muslim woman who lives with her mother in Toronto. Her elder brother has dominated the family since their father's death. Change enters Sabah's universe when she sees an old picture of herself as a smiling child at the beach. She decides to take up swimming again, but she can't bring herself to tell her family.

Of course, secrets, love and complications ensue.

Sabah and her family struggle with all the issues of modernity that Jews encountered when they left the walls of the ghetto/mellah and encountered modern western culture. One of the best scenes is when Sabah's niece fends off an arranged marriage to a modern Arab suitor by pretending to be a devout Muslim woman, when all along she is hiding her belly-button ring.

There are other struggles, too. Recently a Sikh teenager in Vancouver alleged he was set upon by a gang of whites and had his turban removed and his hair cut. As it turned out, he cut his hair himself. Community leaders called for his prosecution. It seems to me this event called for compassion, not prosecution. This community, too, struggles with modernity, a new life in a new world, and the overpowering issue of group survival. (I am told that the suicide rate among Sikh girls is one of the highest in any ethnic group.)

This all sounds so familiar to communities, including ours, that try to survive with traditions and heritage intact while meeting the demands of daily life in a larger world. We all try to give our children and grandchildren the essence of our heritage, customs and community – the beliefs that hold us together. And we all struggle with the outcomes when we fail, or seem to fail.

I think about the issues we live with. Our children may be gay; how do we explain it to the family? They may have disabilities; can we be strong enough to make the most of their abilities? They want to be poets – what, no "my child the doctor?" They marry non-Jews; will we welcome the partners, or cut them off?

Since the Emancipation of European Jewry, our community has faced the issue of modernity. We still struggle with it. While some blame the Holocaust on that very Emancipation, we have learned from scholars such as Rav Soleveitchik that we can live in both worlds. We could share our triumphs and struggles with others, if only barriers of hatred and custom were not so high.

So I thought about issues brought on by the two stories – one fiction, one real-world – and wished so much was different in the real-time scroll of life.

The film reminded me that, with the gap between Arabs and Jews, we are missing out on some great music, food and companionship. I wish we could celebrate with our Arab neighbours and share what we have learned living in two worlds.

I wish that communities seeking to live in two worlds would sooner recognize the signs of distress in their young, so that before the explosions of anger, rebellion and grief, there would be ways to bridge the gap between father and son, mother and child.

I wish that compassion could replace shame, understanding replace anger, and that we could celebrate our children and the lives they choose to live.

Finally, I wish that all of us could once again visit Damascus and see the ancient synagogue of Dura Europa, with its enigmatic portrayals of biblical scenes, painted at a time when Jews could appropriate the icons of the larger Hellenistic culture and use them to tell their own stories.

I look forward to my fourth trip to Damascus.

Religion's growing intrusion into politics

In recent years in the United States, particularly during election campaigns, much has been said about the influence of organized religion on the funding, support and policy of political candidates. This is not surprising, of course, given that America's national motto is, "In God we trust," and almost every major U.S. presidential address ends with the words "and may God bless America."

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

It's not a new phenomenon, but religion's reach into the realm of politics has recently become much more pronounced and controversial. Case in point: former Democratic presidential candidate Howard Dean, now chairman of the Democratic National Committee, recently attracted considerable criticism in the United States when he commented that the Republican Party is "pretty much a white, Christian party."

Often, religious interests inject themselves into politics on a single issue or related group of issues. For example, Focus on the Family, an evangelical Christian lobby group, entered the U.S. political arena primarily to confront the issues of same-sex marriage, homosexuality and abortion.

Clearly, religion has had a major influence in shaping modern American politics and, therefore, modern American society. At the same time, there has been a significant spillover into Canada when it comes to the interface or mix of politics and religion.

For example, in opposing federal legislation legalizing same-sex marriage, Bishop Fred Henry, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Calgary, recently asserted that he would not give communion to Prime Minister Paul Martin (who describes himself as a "devout Catholic") because of Martin's support of same-sex marriage. Bishop Henry also issued a pastoral letter critical of the prime minister that eventually led to a complaint against the bishop being filed with the Alberta Human Rights and Citizenship Commission on the grounds of discrimination against homosexuals.

Certainly, all political parties include members of many faiths, but religion has been seen to be more of an issue with the Reform and Canadian Alliance parties and the new Conservative Party. Former Alliance leader Stockwell Day readily confirmed the influence of his Christian religious background on his politics. Reform Party founder Preston Manning brought his religious background to his new party – something that's not surprising, given that his father's Social Credit Party also had a significant religious base.

In modern western democracies, we talk about the importance of separating church and state. In contrast, many other nations have bodies politic that are defined in terms of a particular religion. For example, Iran's president-elect, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has expressed a desire to create an even stronger Islamic regime in his country.

Recently, after meeting with Italian President Carlo Ciampi, Pope Benedict said that Italy and the Vatican were autonomous, but he added that the Church has the right to comment on ethical issues nonetheless.

In Canada, for the most part, we don't bring the same religious fervour to our politics as some do elsewhere. Yet, the preamble to our own Charter of Rights and Freedoms asserts that Canada is a nation based on the "supremacy of God." In 1981-1982, when our parliamentarians were debating the contents of the proposed charter, this reference to God was included, removed and then re-included. In any event, the phrase remains part of our Constitution.

There are, of course, moral aspects to many political decisions.

However, rather than expecting that our politicians promote their particular religious values, they should be expected to consider what is in the best interest of all Canadians. They should consider what promotes the Canadian constitutional values that we hold dear: the protection of minorities, freedom of religion, egalitarianism, and the pursuit of life, liberty and security of the person.

Religion can give us a moral code to live by. But you can be moral – living a righteous life – and yet not be religious. Many societal norms, precepts, obligations and directives do not depend on religion-based morality.

The making of policy, therefore, need not be tied to, nor in any way be interwoven with, religious dictates. Politics and religion should coexist, just as the making of policy and other national non-religious imperatives may also coexist.

What, then, is the concern about this now widespread phenomenon of mixing politics and religion? A discussion of the dangers of religion permeating political decision-making will be the subject of a future column.

Town in Germany helps build a synagogue

Fawek Ostrowiecki's fondest wish is being fulfilled. Gelsenkirchen, a town deep in Germany's industrial heartland, the Ruhr Valley, is lending its financial support to a special project dear to his heart.

Three years ago, Ostrowiecki – a 78-year-old Polish Holocaust survivor and president of the Jewish community – asked city council to help rebuild a local synagogue destroyed by the Nazis on Kristallnacht on Nov. 9, 1938. It was one of two shuls here desecrated on that day of infamy.

Sheldon Kirshner in Gelsenkirchen

Ostrowiecki, who has been living in Germany since the end of World War II and has a cousin in Montreal, argued that the influx of Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union in the past decade necessitated the construction of a new synagogue on its old site, off Gildenstrasse.

Ten years ago, Gelsenkirchen, with a population of about 275,000, was home to a declining Jewish community of some 40 Jews, mainly from Poland, Hungary and Romania. But now 10 times as many Jews live here, and more are expected to arrive in the coming years, despite an announcement by the German government on June 25 tightening immigration laws for Russian Jews.

Having heard Ostrowiecki's case for rebuilding the Gildenstrasse synagogue to accommodate the inflow of new Jewish immigrants – primarily from Russia, Ukraine and Belarus – city council, in a gesture of repentance, agreed on a formula to pay for it. Gelsenkirchen, the state of North Rhine-Westphalia and the Jewish community would each contribute one-third of the cost, estimated at 5,200,000 euros, or $7.8 million (US).

Construction will begin next month, and is scheduled to be finished on Nov. 9, 2006. Ground was broken last November by Paul Spiegel, president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, at a square known as the Platz der alten Synagoge, which faces a bank. At a ceremony attended by civic and Jewish community leaders, Spiegel hailed the project as "a sign of hope" that a "new beginning" between Jews and Germans was possible.

The rebuilt synagogue, which will be served by a travelling rabbi who also tends to the needs of nearby communities, will supplant an existing shul in the community centre. It was opened in 1958, four years after Ostrowiecki's arrival in Gelsenkirchen.

Born in Lodz, Ostrowiecki survived the rigours of the Lodz ghetto. When it was liquidated in August 1944, he was sent to Auschwitz, where nearly all the members of his immediate family were killed. After the war, finding himself stranded in Germany, he settled in Stuttgart, the headquarters of the Mercedes-Benz automobile empire. He and his wife had two children, a daughter and a son, both of whom live in Berlin today. Asked why he remained in Germany, he replied, "I don't know. It just happened. Nobody wanted to stay."

At the urging of his brother, Ostrowiecki moved to Gelsenkirchen, which is close to the Ruhr Valley's coal mines and steel factories. There they were partners in a wholesale business. He and his brother were among some 30 Jewish survivors in Gelsenkirchen in the mid-1950s. By then, its pre-war German Jewish inhabitants were gone. One hundred returned in 1945, only to leave several months later, bound for the United States and Palestine.

One thousand six hundred and sixteen Jews lived here on the eve of Adolf Hitler's accession to power in January 1933, said Andrea Niewerth, a 37-year-old historian who has written a book about Gelsenkirchen's Jewish community from 1933 to 1945. The book is based on a PhD thesis she submitted to Essen University. It is not the only German-language book on the topic. Another one was written by a historian named Stefen Goch.

Fawek Ostrowiecki

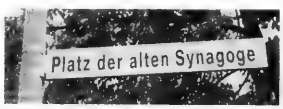
They concur that the Nazis struck the first concerted blow against the Jewish community in April 1933 with an economic boycott of Jewish-owned shops. It had an effect because most Jews were merchants. Stung by the boycott, Jewish families began emigrating. By 1937, 1,097 Jews were left in Gelsenkirchen.

On Kristallnacht, the so-called Night of Broken Glass, mobs incited by the Nazi regime torched the town's two shuls. The Gildenstrasse synagogue was built in 1885, nine years after the Jewish community was officially established. The other shul, in the suburb of Buer, was completed in 1922, during the heyday of the Weimar Republic. A brown marble plaque in a quiet residential neighbourhood commemorates its destruction. In its place is an indoor swimming pool.

Andrea Niewerth

By June 1939, 720 Jews remained in Gelsenkirchen. Shortly after the outbreak of the war, three months later, Jewish men were packed off to the Sachsenhausen concentration camp. Conditions worsened as Jews were forced to live in segregated "Jew houses." Jews married to people of Christian or partly Jewish ancestry were summarily dispatched to labour camps, Niewerth said.

Elena Pestova and husband Boris



Deportations began in January 1942 with the transport of Jews to the Riga ghetto. In further deportations, Jews were sent to the Warsaw ghetto and the Theresienstadt concentration camp in Czechoslovakia. According to Niewerth, half of Gelsenkirchen's Jewish burghers were murdered, while the rest managed to escape before Hitler cut off emigration in the autumn of 1940.

Ostrowiecki noted that Soviet Jews in Gelsenkirchen, as elsewhere in Germany, have had serious integration problems. Hard-pressed to find jobs in a state wracked by an unusually high unemployment rate, many of the newcomers are on welfare. And the great majority are in interfaith marriages, he added.

Margarita Fuks, 47, is one of the new immigrants. Petite and blond, and a single mother from Zhitomir, Ukraine, she immigrated to Germany eight years ago with her father and daughter, who recently wed a German. I met Fuks one morning at the Jewish community centre, where she works as a kindergarten teacher.

(Oddly enough, one of her students is the son of an ethnic German woman from Russia who enrolled him in the kindergarten in the hope that he will learn Russian).

"It's been very hard," she said of her efforts to acclimatize herself to German society. "I was a Jew in Ukraine, but here, I'm a Ukrainian." Although she is keenly conscious of Germany's Nazi past, she prefers Gelsenkirchen to Zhitomir. "It's better here because there is more security."

Elena Pestova and her husband, Boris, a former Russian army officer, came from Nichni Tagil, in the Urals. In her late 20s, she is unemployed, but her spouse works in a factory. They emigrated so that their six-year-old daughter would have a better future. "The economic situation in Russia was uncertain." She wanted to settle in Israel, but her mother, who has a sister in Germany, steered them to Gelsenkirchen.

Tetyana Bidna and her Jewish husband, a nurse, are from Vinnitsa, in Ukraine, and have been in Germany five years."The prospects were better here," she said, summarizing the rationale for choosing Germany as their adopted homeland and Gelsenkirchen as their new home.

Settlers in Elon Moreh region keep building

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

The people of Elon Moreh continue to build their settlement while the Israeli government has plans for a disengagement in the area and their neighbours shoot at them and throw stones daily.

"We love Eretz Yisrael and would not even consider moving. This is not a real estate or monetary motivation but part of our responsibility to inherit our land," Rabbi Benny Gur, the development director of the settlement.

Rabbi Benny Gur

Life in the Elon Moreh region, which is surrounded by Arab villages, is not easy. Aside from the terror threat, the settlement is also far from any of the big cities and lies at the end of a dead-end road. An added hardship is the security barrier, which is cutting the settlers off from Israel.

However, people continue to move into the area and make it their home, seeing themselves as emissaries at the forefront of the Zionist effort.

In 1975, after seven unsuccessful attempts, the first Jewish occupants of Elon Moreh got permission from former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and then-defence minister Shimon Peres to settle there.

Rabbi Gur said the settlers of Elon Moreh are seen as the pioneers of the settlement effort in the Judea and Samaria region.

The Elon Moreh settlers' motto is, "Torah and faith confronts terror and aggression," and in keeping with this, they have developed an educational institution incorporating five different centres.

"In most situations, a Torah centre is isolated from central life and not integrated into reality," Rabbi Gur said. However, the Elon Moreh region is different with the Torah centre being the backbone of the settlement and seen as a defensive wall protecting its people and the Land of Israel.

"We aim to be open and up to date with Israeli society while living in conjunction with Torah values," Rabbi Gur continued.

The institution is made up of a college for women, training both single and married women for leadership positions in education; a hesder yeshiva, where military service and talmudic study are integrated in a five-year program; the Beit Midrash Rabbinic and Pedagogic Seminary, designed to prepare rabbis and teachers for service in communal and educational frameworks; Yeshivat Har Homesh, in the Homesh area, a hesder program combining religious study, military training and an agricultural component, meant to help the young men strengthen their connection to the Land of Israel; and the El-Artzi high school, a fully accredited four-year program for immigrant students, particularly those from Russia.

On one of the institution's pamphlets it states, "Torah is our most potent weapon and those who live by its code will prevail… faith in our creator is the core of our commitment to Eretz Yisrael and the Torah is the blueprint for our actions."

Rabbi Gur said the planned disengagement is a "giving up" on the part of the Israeli government. "It is my belief that fighting terror is done by continuing the fight, not giving up. Giving up the settlements will cause the flames of terror to rise up because the terrorists will see that they can shake our commitment to our land and this will give them an opening to become even stronger."

The people of Elon Moreh believe that unlike the government, they see the total picture.

Rabbi Gur said, "We told them [the government] not to give them [the Palestinians] rifles because they will work against us. And we were right.

Philanthropists aid Israeli 'lone soldiers'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Gerry Schwartz and Heather Reisman, centre at the back, with some of the soldiers in Heseg, the program to aid 'lone soldiers.'

A fortuitous walk on the waterfront in Athens during the Olympic Games two years ago has led to the creation of a unique program to aid "lone soldiers" in Israel.

One of Canada's foremost power couples, Gerry Schwartz, president and CEO of Onex Corporation, and Heather Reisman, chair and CEO of Indigo Books and Music, have launched an organization called Heseg that will disburse scholarship funds to soldiers living alone in Israel who have completed their army service and who intend to remain in the country.

Heseg, "achievement" in Hebrew, will provide 100 full scholarships in each of the next three years so that when the program is running at full capacity, 300 former soldiers will be attending Israeli universities or trade schools. They will also have their living expenses underwritten. At its peak, Heseg will distribute $3 million per year, Schwartz said.

Schwartz, who has also donated $12 million to the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow campaign towards the community's new Vaughan campus, said Heseg "is the one [project] that has my heart and it certainly has my full attention now."

Two years ago, Schwartz had never heard of "lone soldiers." At the time, he was searching for a way to help young people in Israel when a security guard assigned to protect him, Reisman and a second high profile couple in Athens planted the seed. The guard, Matan, had served in Shin Bet, Israel's domestic intelligence and security agency, and he said, "'You ought to think about doing something about lone soldiers. Nobody takes care of them,'" Schwartz recalled.

"I didn't even know about lone soldiers," he added.

He soon learned that the Israel Defence Force (IDF) at any one time has close to 6,000 soldiers in service who have mostly volunteered from abroad, and who enlist without having the kind of domestic supports that homegrown IDF soldiers rely upon to ease their army duty.

Where sabra soldiers usually head home for weekend leave, lone soldiers often just hang out at their base. Sometimes lone soldiers enlist without the support of their families – even in the face of their vocal opposition – making them feel even more isolated, Schwartz said.

Researching the subject, Schwartz learned that lone soldiers come from around the world, including North America, Brazil, Argentina, Uzbekistan, Switzerland and even Chechnya.

They come to Israel out of a deep Zionist commitment. "These kids are the volunteers of the volunteers" and they serve in all sorts of IDF units, including combat units.

As he set about trying to create an infrastructure to support the Heseg program, he learned that lone soldiers can reach the highest levels in the military. Discussing the subject with Brig.-Gen. Benny Zucker, commander of the Tel Nof air force base near Tel Aviv, Zucker told him, "'Of course I know [about lone soldiers]. I was a lone soldier.'"

Schwartz assembled a 12-person advisory board chaired by Itamar Rabinovitch, president of Tel Aviv University and formerly Israel's ambassador to Washington. The board includes representatives of the IDF and includes a lieutenant-colonel who heads the IDF's sniper school. It turns out he too is also a lone soldier, the son of an Orthodox rabbi who moved to Israel from California 16 years ago against the wishes of his family.

The advisory board will make the final determination of candidates for scholarships after they had been vetted by their base and unit commanders.

About two months ago, Heseg was launched at a ceremony at the Sde Dov air base that was attended by 170 lone soldiers as well as by the IDF Chief of Staff, the Chief of the Air Force, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, and many other dignitaries.

One of the attendees was Matan, who was taken aback at what was happening.

"He was incredulous that the conversation walking along the waterfront in Athens led to this," Schwartz said.

Adath Israel's ramp to bimah 'may be the final frontier'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Earlier this month, on the second day of Shavuot, Adath Israel Congregation dedicated its new permanent ramp to the bimah in the main sanctuary.

Surprisingly, in light of public awareness in recent years about accessibility for people in wheelchairs, the new addition seems to be a rarity. An informal phone survey of almost a dozen Toronto synagogues turned up none with a permanent ramp to the bimah, although the buildings themselves are wheelchair accessible and some congregations can put up a temporary ramp with advance notice.

The message a permanent ramp conveys is, "We want you to be a full participant," said disability advocate, David Lepofsky, a lawyer who is blind. "Last time I looked, the problem was never that too many people come to shul."

Adath Israel began to address the issue of accessibility in 1997. At the time, the building was 41 years old. By 1999 there were three ramps to make the entrance, sanctuary and social hall wheelchair accessible, as well as an elevator, which operates automatically on Shabbat and holidays.

In the sanctuary, several attempts were made to accommodate people in wheelchairs before the new $72,000 renovation was completed. A mechanical lift at one side of the bimah stairs, which had to be operated with a key by one of the maintenance staff, proved unsatisfactory.

When the synagogue hosted Israeli war veterans from Beit Halochem many years ago, those who couldn't walk were carried onto the bimah, said Bob Kornhauser, chair of the bimah installation committee. It bothered him at the time to see them singled out like that, he said.

At the dedication of the elevator and original ramps in 1999, the reading table was brought down from the bimah to the level of the congregation to facilitate an aliyah for Harry Senders, a longtime member who uses a wheelchair because of a medical condition affecting his leg muscles.

However, the word "bimah" means "platform," and it should be on a higher level, said Rabbi David Seed, the synagogue's associate rabbi.

Senders, a semi-retired businessman who has lobbied to make the synagogue more accessible and was involved in fundraising for the projects, was the first to be honoured with an aliyah using the new ramp to the bimah.

"It's beautiful, it's inconspicuous. You're not standing out as a disabled person. You blend into the community," said Senders.

Nor does anyone have to ask for temporary accommodations to be made. "People don't like to do that," he said.

The new ramp, which is enclosed, is not immediately visible. The entrance is at the front right of the sanctuary, and building it meant expanding outward into the parking lot.

Other possibilities that were considered would have interfered with the esthetic of the bimah, according to Rabbi Erwin Schild, rabbi emeritus of the congregation, who came up with the idea of putting the ramp outside and enclosing it. "It's a very neat solution, a very lucky and fortunate solution," he said.

Over the years since he became Adath Israel's rabbi in 1947, there were often weddings or bar mitzvahs where the celebrants wanted to have family members in wheelchairs on the bimah or under the chuppah with them, Rabbi Schild said.

"In those days we were not so sensitive to those needs," said Rabbi Schild. "Society in general accepted that handicapped people had to be satisfied not enjoying most of what other people had. One of the wonderful things that happened in the last thirty or forty years is that we have become sensitive to the needs of the so-called disabled. As long as we persisted in our insensitivity, they were disabled. They couldn't [easily] go to museums or concerts. Why should people be disabled from enjoying life?"

In an online publication of the Chicago-based Retirement Research Foundation, Accessible Faith: A Technical Guide for Accessibility in Houses of Worship, the bimah, pulpit, lectern and choir area are included in a list of areas that "may be the final frontier of accessibility in most houses of worship.

"Full participation in worship should include opportunities for leadership roles, which requires access to the traditional locations of leadership," it stated.

"Other than what is currently in the building code and the human rights code, there are no standards that apply specifically to houses of worship," said Ruth Lewkowicz, senior co-ordinator of the communications branch of Ontario's ministry of citizenship and immigration. "Accessibility is more than being able to get into the building. It's being able to participate fully once you get into the building."

Lewkowicz noted that the recently approved Accessibility for Ontarians with Disabilities Act, which applies to public and private sector organizations, aims to create an accessible Ontario within 20 years.

Senders said that within the congregation alone, there are about 200 people, including close relatives of members and parents using strollers, who are potential users of the ramps and elevator.

A WINNING SCORE

The Zareinu Golf Tournament, sponsored by Emery Investments, kicked off the charitable golf tournament season by posting a winning score of more than $250,000. The funds raised will be used for specialized equipment and therapy for the Zareinu students who all have special needs. About $16,000 was raised separately to buy modified hand bicycles and other apparatus that will give the children a degree of independence and self-sufficiency. Seen, from left, are the tournament co-chairs, Jeff Lanys and Evan Sone, and Zareinu president Danny Gordon.

The lesson of Moses' misdeed

By RABBI YOSSI MICHALOWICZ

This week's Torah portion describes the unimaginable: Moshe, the greatest leader of Jewish history, doing a sin!

After Miriam's death, the Jewish people no longer have water to drink in the desert. The Almighty instructs Moshe to speak to the rock in order to renew its life-giving water. However, Moshe ultimately strikes the rock, which does indeed produce the water necessary for the Jewish people.

The Almighty considers this a sin, as He says (Bamidbar, chapter 20, verse12), "Because you did not believe in Me to sanctify Me in the eyes of the Children of Israel, therefore, you will not bring this congregation to the land that I have given them."

Rashi explains what the sin is: "For had you spoken to the rock and it would have brought forth water, I would have been sanctified before the eyes of the assembly, and they would have said, 'Now, if this rock which neither speaks nor hears, and does not need subsistence, fulfills the word of the Almighty, how much more so should we fulfill His word.'"

The obvious question is: Is there any major difference between a miracle of water coming out of a rock as a result of hitting it or talking to it? For such a minute difference, Moshe's punishment seems disproportionate. Do we want to come away from this story feeling, "Boy, you have to be careful in following the Almighty's instructions, because any deviation from His orders leads to disastrous results"?

In contrast to Rashi, Maimonides explains that Moshe's sin was getting angry at the people as a response to their criticisms during this incident. But Nachmonides rejects this answer, since the reason that the Almighty gives for Moshe's punishment is: "Because you did not believe in Me to sanctify Me in the eyes of the Children of Israel." Anger is not mentioned.

The Maharal synthesizes both interpretations with the following fundamental principle: a person who totally believes in the Almighty never gets angry. Moshe was given a mission by the Almighty to perform a miracle. When a person receives a particular mission by God, he must also understand that he has the potential to accomplish that mission. Once a person truly realizes this, he must have bitachon – trust in God and the confidence to accomplish the mission. Where there is real bitachon in your mission and confidence in being able to accomplish what you set out to do, only feelings of contentment, satisfaction and happiness should result.

Moshe's anger in this situation indicated that he was not bound to this mission with the ultimate confidence necessary. Because of his level of greatness, he needed to display incredible levels of trust in the One who sent him.

According to the Maharal, the point here was not so much for the Israelites to witness the miracle of seeing water coming out of a stone, since they were already used to seeing miracles. The issue was to show the people how all of creation bends, leans and flows to do the will of God.

When you talk to a stone that has no heart or mind and it performs the will of God, it proves that, deep down in the nature of the world, there is a will to fulfil the word of God. This is inherent in the nature of existence. This point can only be expressed when you talk to the stone. Once you hit it with a stick, the message is different: "Yes the will of God gets done, but you have to carry a big stick to make it happen!"

The point was to show the Jews that there is a perfect unity that lies deep in the universe to do the will of God. Had the Jews seen this in the universe, they would say that they, too, could do the will of God. Then they would have had the confidence to enter the Holy Land, knowing that the country would respond willingly to their mission of inhabiting it.

Female scribe writes Torah for Seattle synagogue

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Aviel Barclay, a Vancouver-based artist, calligrapher and the world's first known certified soferet – or female Torah scribe – is writing a sefer Torah for a synagogue in nearby Seattle, Wash.

Barclay, who trained with a Jerusalem-based sofer, is completing the Torah for Kadima, an 80-family progressive congregation formed in 1978 that currently lacks a scroll of its own.

You could say that Barclay, 36, became a soferet by accident. Originally a gemologist, she was riding her bicycle to work in her native Victoria one day in 1991 when the door of a parked car opened unexpectedly, sending her bouncing and sliding down a long hill. The accident crushed her right hand.

"The hand healed well, but there's permanent nerve damage and the hand gets cold and tired easily," Barclay says

She was unable to work as a gemologist and she started selling jewelry. She also had to learn to write all over again.

One day, while doing her handwriting exercises, she remembered her love as a child for the Hebrew aleph-bet.

"I began to think about writing Torahs," she says. "I wasn't sure if it was something that women could do, so I started to do some research. I couldn't find a reference to a woman having done it, but neither could I find anything specifically forbidding the practice."

(Commentators are divided on the issue, with Orthodox ones generally holding that the Talmud doesn't allow women to write a Torah for ritual use.)

After deciding to go ahead, Barclay began to look for an experienced sofer who would be willing to teach her.

"I called sofrim all over the world, but I couldn't find anyone who would take me as a student," she says. "Just the fact that I was female was enough for all of them to reject me."

Barclay continued to sell jewelry and practise Hebrew calligraphy. In 1996, she got an e-mail out of the blue from a sofer in Jerusalem asking if she wanted a teacher. She jumped at the rabbi's offer and immediately began a correspondence course with him in calligraphy.

First known certified soferet

The rabbi (who wishes to remain anonymous) said it "might be possible" for him to teach her Torah writing if they met and if they hit it off. He also insisted that she live an observant life and keep their arrangement confidential.

Right away Barclay asked herself, "How do I get to Israel?"

In 1997, she got there via the now-defunct Project Oren, which combined a stay on a kibbutz with ulpan and a drawing and painting course.

She learned to write megillot from her teacher, but in 1998, she ran out of money and had to return to Victoria.

"I spent the next five years in purgatory, trying to earn enough money to get back to Israel and continue learning with my teacher," she says. "'But I just wasn't able to do it."

Her luck changed in January 2003 when she received a call from Kadima.

"They wanted their own Torah and they wanted a woman to write it for them," Barclay says.

She agreed to do it, but first she wanted to return to Israel to finish her training. Kadima agreed to pay Barclay's tuition and living expenses.

She returned to Canada, moved to Vancouver and began to write the Torah.

"The work is going slowly and I don't know when I'm going to finish," she says. "It puts a lot of strain on my hand. But I've finished Genesis and I'm part way through Exodus.'

Wendy Graff, of Kadima's Woman's Torah Project, said the shul "could have gotten a Torah for less money. But once we realized that a woman had never scribed a Torah, I knew I could never look at one the same way again."

So far, according to the Woman's Torah Project website, $33,881 (US) has been raised from 300 donors in 30 states to meet the $60,000 cost of the project.

Barclay says she knows of no other woman who has written a sefer Torah.

A member of Vancouver's Congregation Shaarey Tefillah, which is affiliated with the Union for Traditional Judaism, Barclay is married to composer and musician Joel Rothschild.

A conservative critiques U.S. militarism

The American Militarism: How Americans Are Seduced by War* by Andrew J. Bacevich, Oxford University Press.

Books
Bernard Baskin

When does it all stop? When is enough enough? The United States now spends more on defence then all the other nations of the world combined. Adjusted for today's inflation, the Pentagon budget is 12 per cent larger then the average defence budget of the Cold War era. American defence spending exceeds, by a factor of 25, the combined budgets of the seven designated "rogue nations."

Hundreds of American military bases, large and small, are spread around the world, and the planning for advanced high-tech weaponry continues apace.

Actually, writes the author of this provocative and disturbing book, "Today, as never before in their history, Americans are enthralled with military power. They come to define the nation's strength and well-being in terms of military preparedness, military action, and the fostering of (or nostalgia for) military ideals."

And marching in lockstep with this exaggerated reliance on force is America's belief in its "exceptionalism." This is the view that the U.S. incarnates universal ideals and values that are valid for all times and places.

Andrew J. Bacevich, a graduate of West Point, a Vietnam veteran and director of the Center for International Relations at Boston University, is a self-professed conservative, a non-pacifist and the advocate of a strong American fighting force.

But the marriage of militarism and utopian ideology, argues the author, "commits Americans to a futile enterprise, turning the United States into a crusader state with a self-proclaimed mission of driving history to its final destination: the worldwide embrace of the American way of life. This mindset invites endless war and the ever-deepening militarization of U.S. policy… It will end in bankruptcy, moral as well as economic, and in abject failure."

In an important caveat, Bacevich cautions against blaming 9/11– or President George W. Bush – for the rise of American militarism. Instead, he carefully details how it developed in the three decades after the Vietnam War.

Various groups in American society – military strategists, politicians on the make, intellectuals, strategists, Christian evangelicals, and even purveyors of pop culture – came to see the revival and celebration of military power as the antidote to all the ills besetting the country as a consequence of Vietnam and the 1960s.

In a relatively brief mention of Israel, the author suggests that the strong support of the religious right for Israel, and for how it makes use of its military power, has influenced conservative Christian thinking. "By extension, this evangelical attitude has altered the terms of religious discourse about war and the use of force in ways that have contributed to the militarization of U.S. policy."

Bacevich proposes a number of correctives to the present situation. These include having Congress fulfil its constitutional responsibility of deciding when to declare war; organizing U.S. forces explicitly for national defence; devising an appropriate way to determine the level of defence spending; enhancing alternative aspects of statecraft, such as diplomacy; and reviving the dormant concept of the citizen-soldier.

Given the present widespread American attitude that the book so well describes, it is highly unlikely that any of the remedies suggested will find quick or ready acceptance.

The 17th Maccabiah Games – Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began our look at the world's premier Jewish sporting event, the Maccabiah, which begins July 10 in Israel.

When Yosef Yekutieli lobbied for Jewish games in Palestine back in 1928, he hoped the "Maccabiada" would take place in time for the 1800th anniversary of the Bar Kochba Rebellion (132–135 CE). They did. But when they began in 1932, their titled was Hebraicized to "Maccabiah." [http://tinyurl.com/9p567]

Where does the name "Maccabiah" come from? Here are two explanations from the Encyclopedia Judaica:

"The word Maccabi is formed by taking the Hebrew acronym of the words Mi Kamocha Ba'ay-lim Ado-shem/ Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? (Exodus 15:11) [http://tinyurl.com/cs6wm]

"[The Maccabiah] was named after Judah Maccabee, famous for his role in the revolt against the Greeks in the story of Chanukah." [www.maccabicanada.com/about/movement.html]

The official Maccabiah 17 site gives a very good overview of this year's games in English, Hebrew and Spanish. [www.maccabiah17.com/] In the video section, you can watch Yael Arad, Israel's first Olympic medalist (silver, judo, 1992) as she lights the torch at the 14th Maccabiah. There's also a great clip with the late Naomi Shemer singing Al Kol Ayleh at the opening ceremonies in 1985. Please note that the quality of these clips is very good, but since they are quite large, they take a while to download, even with a quick connection. [http://tinyurl.com/72vk8] One more note: the Maccabiah 17 site performed fine in Windows, but was quite finicky on a Mac. Perhaps you'll fare better.

Athletes attending this year's Maccabiah will compete in more than 30 games and sports, including triathlon, chess, wrestling, bridge and water polo. More than 55 countries are invited, with 6,000 competitors and 14,000 coaches, escorts and attendees expected. [www.maccabiworld.org/] The Canadian Maccabi site has links to many other national Maccabi sites, including those from Argentina, Brazil, Germany and the United States. [www.maccabicanada.com/links.html]

While looking for photographs from previous Maccabiahs, I came across a wonderful treasure trove. The State of Israel's National Photo Collection has thousands of historic photos online. Just go to the collection [www.mof.gov.il/pictures/defaulte.html], then type in a keyword such as "Maccabiah" and you'll get some lovely results. (You can use this site for just about any topic that interests you.)

If you've ever dreamed of competing on the international stage but aren't quite ready for the track, the pool or the rugby pitch, you may still be in luck. The Maccabiah has long featured events that require both brawn and brain. That means you, bridge and chess masters. [http://tinyurl.com/bexrg] If even that sounds too taxing but you're determined to live vicariously as a competitor, then print off an athletes' menu, head to the kitchen and munch like a champion. [http://tinyurl.com/9yk33]

People attend the Maccabiah games for all sorts of reasons. Back in 2001, Denver's Todd Schayes came as a player-coach, but it seems he was interested in more than just basketball. During the televised opening ceremonies, the 36-year-old athlete held up a sign that read: "Single male. American. Looking for Israeli wife. Contact Todd Schayes at the Tel Aviv Hilton." More than 4,500 women did. Unfortunately, none of them seemed to be his bashert. [http://tinyurl.com/dpn43]

Fortunately for Schayes, the story didn't end there. Back in the States, Elaine Housman of Kent, Conn., was reading about the athlete and his exploits in her local Jewish paper. "I screamed, 'I have found the man for Diane!'" Housman wrote Schayes to tell him about her 30-year-old niece, Diane Lipner. As reported in the New York Times, Todd and Diane's e-mail relationship developed into a full-blown courtship, culminating in their 2003 wedding. [http://tinyurl.com/bz74s]

Although Schayes' quest started in front of TV cameras at the Maccabiah games in Israel, his relatives say he really doesn't seek the limelight. "He's very low-key, very mellow," said Jon Housman, a cousin of the bride. "He told me: 'I'm not a hopeless romantic. I'm a hopeful romantic.'"

Baycrest hosts international medical videoconference

Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care hosted its largest ever international medical rounds recently.

Israeli, Jordanian, Palestinian and South African doctors reviewed a complex patient case via a simultaneous videoconference link.

The World Health Organization (WHO) also participated from Geneva.

Dr. David Conn, Baycrest's head of psychiatry and medical director of Telehealth, opened the rounds by greeting participants from the different time zones around the world. There were friendly rounds of applause as each country was introduced.

"We are very excited as this is largest number of international sites that we've connected simultaneously," said Conn.

In all, six international sites participated in the historic Telehealth videoconference, including Tel Aviv University; Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem; Jordan University of Science and Technology; the WHO; the Nelson R. Mandela School of Medicine in Durban, South Africa; and, representing Canada, Baycrest and St. John's Rehabilitation Hospital in Toronto.

The medical case involved a 70-year-old patient with cognitive difficulties, personality changes, bipolar affective disorder and Parkinsonism. Dr. Sarah Thompson, a psychiatry resident at Baycrest, presented the case study, followed by presentations on neuropsychological and neuro-imaging test results from Dr. Brian Richards (Baycrest) and Dr. Sandra Black (Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre). Dr. Morris Freedman (Baycrest) interviewed the patient and chaired the interactive discussion that followed with the doctors from around the world.

"This is a wonderful opportunity to show how co-operation and the exchange of knowledge can bind people together," said Dr. Arnold Noyek, director of the Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health at Mount Sinai Hospital and chair of the Canada International Scientific Exchange Program.

He said the milestone event would add a new cross-border dimension and technical tool to the ongoing academic exchanges in the Middle East between the Jordanian, Palestinian and Israeli medical communities, and further down the road, contribute to improved health-care education and delivery in developing countries around the world.

A theme that is currently gaining ground in medical and political circles is the belief that sharing medical knowledge vis-a-vis international Telehealth partnerships helps to build bridges of mutual trust and aids the common cause of the betterment of humans within societies.

Board game lets players ponder life's choices

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

After years of obsessing about choices related to love, money and sex, teacher Susan Morry decided to create a board game about life's little trade-offs.

And as they work their way through the game's 660 questions on 330 cards, players of If You Had To Choose...? can also look forward to many hours of considering the pros and cons of different decisions.

They may get to consider whether they prefer to be rich or in love, whether they want to live a long life or be slim, and whether they want a mate who is intelligent or beautiful.

Or perhaps they'll get to ponder this: "If... you have to choose one, would you rather be wealthy but never meet the person of your dreams or earn minimum wage but find your soulmate?"

From two to 10 adults can predict how their counterparts will respond to that and other questions by betting on their answers with chips. The winner is the one who most often correctly predicts the others' responses.

Morry, who teaches high school English in Toronto, said her game is ultimately a spiritual one, as it makes players think about what's really important, while at the same time enabling them to interact and connect with one another.

"We live in a spiritually starved time, and people crave entertainment that will put them more in touch with their souls," she said.

When she was younger, Morry said, she was always asking her friends, "Would you rather this or would you rather that?"

Then, when she became a teacher, those questions often became journal topics for her students, and over time, in-depth discussions about them would develop in her classes.

Around 10 years ago, she realized the questions could become the basis for a board game, and she began to create the game model and write 700 questions, which she said are intentionally provocative and based on hypothetical situations.

Although conceiving the game was relatively easy, its birth was not, with Morry struggling to find the money to make the game a commercial reality.

Susan Morry

But she persevered and finally launched her game last December, with an initial run of 500 units selling out in the first 12 days after the game was featured on CityTV, CFRB radio and in Toronto Metro newspaper.

She markets the game under her own company name, "Choose Games Inc.," which has six shareholders, all friends of hers.

Morry said that even the graphics for the game were carefully chosen. They feature Michelangelo's Adam and Botticelli's Venus – who look like Adam and Eve when placed side by side, Morry said – to emphasize that the game asks questions that are timeless and universal.

Having already broken into the Canadian and American markets, Morry is now focused on Europe.

During the summer, she will be translating the questions into French, to be followed by other European languages.

She also has ideas to expand the game onto the Internet on dating website chatlines, as she feels it could be an excellent way for people to see whether they are compatible with potential mates.

Recently, she received a letter from a chassidic Talmud teacher who said the game was "holy" and embodies the essence of the Talmud, as it is a lesson in choosing between alternatives.

The game is available at local bookstores, including Chapters and Indigo, or online at www.ifyouhadtochoose game.com.

The essential survival manual for growing up Jewish

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

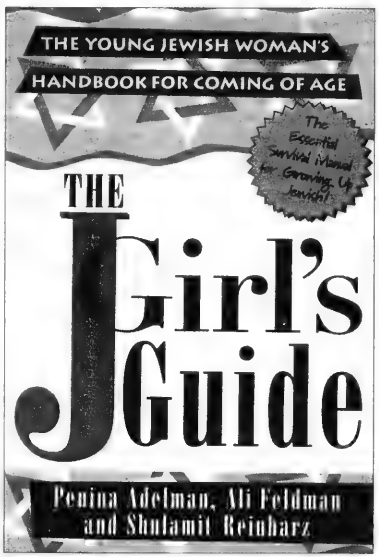
A Jewish girl's journey through adolescence, though often carefree, can also be a time of stress and anxiety.

No one knows this better than Penina Adelman, Ali Feldman and Shulamit Reinharz, authors of The JGirl's Guide, The Essential Survival Manual for Growing up Jewish. (Jewish Lights, www.jewishlights.com). The interactive, easy-to-read book is designed to help pre-teen Jewish girls – JGirls – address the spiritual, educational and psychological issues surrounding coming of age in today's society. It includes such topics as friendship, dealing with authority, coping with stress, self-esteem, and Jewish identity.

As well, the book includes girls' diaries from the last few centuries, ancient and modern texts interpreted by girls and women, and the contemporary voices of Jewish girls responding to the issues they face today.

Reinharz, a professor at the Brandeis University, wrote in the preface that the seeds for the book were planted when Feldman worked as Reinharz's intern at the Hadassah-Brandeis Institute, which is a school that examines issues concerning Jewish women.

Feldman was developing new ideas for bat mitzvah girls, and Reinharz suggested she call Adelman, who had a bat mitzvah-age daughter and ran groups for mothers and daughters.



They decided to write the book, because "no matter how much has been written about being a Jewish girl, there is always a need for more, because the lives of Jewish teens are constantly changing."

Jewish girls today, they say, have more career paths open to them than their grandmothers, are more accepting of alternative lifestyles, and have more choices about motherhood.

"Add the Jewish factor, and your life becomes even more complicated. Where are the models for being Jewish today?"

The modern JGirl can look to the Bible for role models on being a friend, they say.

For instance, David and Jonathan were true friends, they added, because when Jonathan's father, King Saul, wanted David killed because he was a better warrior than Jonathan, Jonathan sacrificed his relationship with his father and chose loyalty to his friend.

The chapter also includes quotes from modern girls, about what they look for in a friend – loyalty, consideration and support are among the many traits listed.

Readers are asked to discuss such issues as being friends with boys, or what to do when you hear someone speak badly about your friend.

They are also given some suggestions for performing random acts of kindness, such as sitting with the new girl at lunch, spending some time with a friend who is sick or lonely, or smiling at someone you don't know.

The teen years are a time to become responsible for your own health. Parents still take you to the doctor and make sure you have food and shelter, "but it is up to you to learn what your body is telling you, and how to keep it healthy."

Among other ways to treat their bodies with respect, girls are told to eat three nutritious meals a day, go to sleep early if they are tired, try to do some physical exercise, and avoid alcohol, drugs and cigarettes.

The bat mitzvah is a perfect opportunity to become a "mitzvah girl." The coming of age ritual can be one that is filled with meaning and significance, not just celebrating and party planning, the book states.

The authors suggest that talking to other people may be one way to find their Jewish identity. As a bar mitzvah project, girls could talk to older girls or women about their bar mitzvah experience, find out about other cultures, or pick a topic that is important to them and study about it in a Jewish text.

Girls are encouraged to keep a journal about their Jewish identity. They book suggests that readers write about what makes them proud to be a Jew, of their feelings for Israel, their most positive experience of being Jewish, or about the most important Jewish symbol.

Jewish identity, "is not one thing or one way of being. There are many ways to be Jewish... and your Jewish identity will change throughout your life.

"As a Jewish girl on your way to becoming a Jewish woman, you are already struggling to figure out your place in the world. You are struggling to understand what it really means to be a Jewish woman rather than any other sort of woman. May your struggle be productive."

Weizmann, Shoppers stalwart 'left tremendous legacy'

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

Arthur Konviser came to Canada in 1977 and joined Shoppers Drug Mart as an executive assistant to the president and an assistant to the legal department.

He eventually attained the position of senior vice-president of corporate affairs and became a senior member of the company's management board.

Arthur Konviser

In his time, the South African-educated lawyer saw three Shoppers presidents come and go.

On June 21, Konviser died in New York just a month short of his 60th birthday. He had been receiving treatment for a rare form of cancer.

In addition to his position with Shoppers Drug Mart, Konviser, who was born in Zimbabwe, also served on numerous community boards and committees.

He was on the board of governors of the Ontario Science Centre, Mount Sinai Hospital, the Baycrest Hospital Foundation, the Parkwood Hospital Foundation in London, Ont., and the Toronto Philharmonia orchestra.

He also worked on fundraising campaigns, including those associated with the Weizmann Institute of Science, the University of Toronto and Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

In 2001, Konviser was elected as president of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science.

According to Michael Meyer, national executive director of Weizmann Canada, "he breathed younger life into the organization."

Aside from being president of Weizmann Canada, Konviser was also on the institute's international board and its board of governors.

His aim was to create more awareness about Weizmann Canada, and this was a job he did "extremely well," Meyer said.

On June 7, Konviser received an invitation to be re-appointed to the international board for another five-year term, Meyer said, and there was no doubt he would have been re-elected.

Meyer said he "left a tremendous legacy behind in the Institute." Konviser was an inspiration to all who worked there, and "we will continue to take inspiration from him," Meyer said.

Sheri Federman, director of programs and operations at Weizmann Canada, said Konviser "was a truly remarkable and greatly loved man, and we will miss him beyond words."

His wife, Eudice Goldberg, a pediatrician at the Hospital for Sick Children, said a family highlight was celebrating the bar mitzvahs of both their sons in Israel. "We had a wonderful life together," she said.

Konviser is survived by his wife and sons Michael and Daniel.

U.S. grad students hostile to Israel, study finds

By GARY ROSENBLATT
New York Jewish Week

NEW YORK — A new survey of attitudes toward Israel among graduate students at top U.S. universities offers a disturbing if not frightening picture of increasing sympathy for the Palestinian cause and blame on the Jewish state for the lack of peace.

The report issued last month by the Israel Project, a Washington-based group that seeks to strengthen Israel's image, found that "tomorrow's leaders… are hostile to the Jewish state."

Titled How The Next Generation Views Israel, the report was written by Frank Luntz, a pollster who has conducted other surveys on young people's attitudes toward Israel and Jewish life.

It was based on "face-to-face group interviews" with nearly 150 students under age 30 in New York, Boston, Washington, Chicago and Los Angeles. They attended law, business, journalism or government programs at Harvard University, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Columbia University, Georgetown University, George Washington University, Johns Hopkins University, the University of Chicago, Northwestern University and UCLA.

Many of them come from homes sympathetic to Israel, Luntz reported, but through exposure to university professors and mainstream media have grown "impatient" with Israel and emotionally connected to the Palestinian cause, to the point of rationalizing Palestinian suicide bombings and coming to see Israel as a "burden" to the United States rather than "an ally."

What's more, Luntz found a thin line between anti-Israel and anti-Jewish sentiment among "these young elites," noting that "they may not be in the 'Zionism is racism' camp, but they're not all that far away." He said the students "view any U.S. support of Israel as generated by wealthy Jewish special interests rather than as a reflection of the national interest."

Luntz said the graduate students do not talk about Mideast issues with Jewish friends, whom they perceive as "indoctrinated" and "emotional."

In the eyes of the graduate students, Luntz said, "to support Israel as a Jew is to be narrow-minded and one-sided. To support the Palestinians is to be progressive and thoughtful."

He noted that many of the students said they changed their attitudes during their college and post-college years as they "learned more," in their words, from professors, Palestinians on campus and the media. The New York Times is their top source of news information, and the BBC is widely watched as well.

The students believe the American media is biased toward Israel, and that Palestinians are making a greater effort toward peace than Israel.

An Israeli government official dealing with media issues said he had not yet read the report but questioned its methodology and intent.

Luntz's style is to "put his pro-Israel views up front" so that much of a focus group's reactions depend on whether the participants like him, said the Israeli official, who asked not to be named.

About half of the 50-page report offers advice on how to counter the dire situation, and Luntz urged pro-Israel groups and individuals to "express genuine recognition" that Palestinians have suffered, but to blame the problem on corrupt Palestinian leaders.

The message, according to Luntz, should be that the security fence and other forms of Israeli self-defence are necessitated by the violence committed by these terror groups, and that once the groups are eliminated, peace prospects will improve.

In recommending advertising that emphasizes peace, tolerance and hope, Luntz criticized ads that only promote Israel's innovative accomplishments.

Canadians likely have similar views, campus workers say

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Graduate students in Canada probably have views about Israel and the Palestinians that are similar to their counterparts in the United States, Jewish campus workers said about a study of U.S. graduate students' attitudes on Mideast issues.

"I would venture to say that if we did have the opportunity to do the research in a scientific manner [in Canada], we would see similar results," said Lance Davis, director of National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL), a resource for campuses across the country.

The Israel Project study of graduate student attitudes, conducted on select American campuses, indicated increasing sympathy for the Palestinians and blaming of Israel for lack of peace, even among students who had previously been more sympathetic toward Israel.

The study shows that focusing on graduate students has to be a priority when it comes to Israel advocacy, Davis said, adding that NJCL has already begun to focus on that area, including some fledgling work with faculty members.

Arieh Rosenblum, NJCL's director of Israel affairs, said the study shows that graduate students' opinions have been shaped in part by their professors. "It's important that professors who are onside speak up."

In line with recommendations made in the study by pollster Frank Luntz, Hillels here need to continue their focus on peace programming and working with student leaders, said Tilly Shames, Israel affairs director for Hillel of Greater Toronto.

"I think this study will lend more credence to what we are already doing, and I think it will offer some new suggestions," Shames said.

"When a graduate student has anti-Israel views, it's very dangerous in a campus environment, because they often have a closer relationship [as teaching assistants] with [undergraduate] students than professors themselves."

However, there are some differences for students on Canadian campuses compared to their U.S. counterparts. Because of the relatively small number of campuses that NJCL serves – about 30 with a significant Jewish student population, and another 20 smaller ones – the organization can provide more comprehensive support than American umbrella organizations can, said Davis. Also, he noted, the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students has created a cohesive network of Israel activist student leaders across the country.

Rosenblum believes that some of the recommendations in the report "need to be paid close attention to. In articulating our support for Israel, our students have to be much more than one-dimensional. There has to be an acknowledgement that Israel is not a perfect place, but then you have to go on to articulate Israel's strengths and values that Canadians can identify with."

Bertrand blasted for Jewish conspiracy charge

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The Supreme Court of Canada issued a scathing condemnation of lawyer Guy Bertrand's allegation that Justice Minister Irwin Cotler and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) conspired to ensure the deportation of Rwandan exile Leon Mugesera, who is accused of inciting hatred and genocide of the Tutsi minority in his native country.

Last week, the court unanimously upheld the deportation order against Mugesera because the evidence against him is well-founded. The ruling was welcomed by CJC and B'nai Brith Canada, who were intervenors in support of the federal government's appeal. The minister was appealing the Federal Court of Appeal's 2003 decision overturning the 1995 deportation order against Mugesera, his wife and five children because it decided the minister had not proved Rwanda's accusations against the former political activist.

The Supreme Court says the motion Bertrand filed in November in an attempt to end proceedings against his client was "unprofessional and unacceptable" and "flagrantly without basis in fact or in law."

Moreover, the court says the motion and supporting documents "include anti-Semitic sentiment and views that most might have thought had disappeared from Canadian society, and even more so from legal debate in Canada." It terms it "scandalous" to allege that "influential members of the Jewish community manipulated the Canadian political system and the country's highest court for the sole purpose of having Mugesera deported."

The Supreme Court had dismissed the motion in December with Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin stating that the reasons for doing so would follow.

"It should be noted that [then immigration minister Denis Coderre's] decision to appeal was made and endorsed by a succession of members of the federal cabinet at various stages in the proceedings, including the application for leave to appeal" and that Cotler was not in the cabinet at the time, the court states.

"The only abuse of process… lies at the feet of the respondent Mugesera and Mr. Bertrand."

Bertrand argued that Mugesera could not get a fair hearing because Cotler plotted with CJC to have Rosalie Abella appointed to the Supreme Court in order to influence the case against his client. He noted that CJC advocated Mugesera's deportation, that Abella's husband Irving is chair of CJC's war crimes committee, and that Cotler was a friend of the couple, a past CJC president, and before becoming a minister, had also spoken out against Mugesera.

He alleged Cotler's not disclosing this during the parliamentary review of Abella's nomination "can only lead a well-informed observer to conclude that unfortunately when you are powerful, rich and influential like the [CJC], for example, you can infiltrate the court through political and judicial lobbying." Bertrand spoke of a covert "parallel justice system."

Even though Abella, who was appointed in August, voluntarily recused herself from the case in September, Bertrand contended that the whole court was "contaminated" by her presence and could not be impartial in the case.

The Supreme Court also called Bertrand's motion "an unqualified and abusive attack on the integrity of the judges" based on "irresponsible innuendo." It says it is "astounding" to propose that the entire court should withdraw from a case because one judge recused herself.

"We are heartened by the Supreme Court's categorical rejection of the dismaying use of anti-Semitism by Mr. Mugesera's legal counsel to bring the Canadian judicial system into disrepute," said CJC president Ed Morgan.

"It was very ironic that a person accused of hate-mongering and inciting genocide would use the classic anti-Semitic slander of Jewish power and wealth that itself promotes hatred and has led to genocide."

Bertrand's allegations, he said, were "off-the-wall and beyond the pale" in Canadian courts. He said there was nothing improper in CJC's participating in this case and no secret that it has a long history of trying to bring Nazi-era war criminals to justice.

Morgan, a University of Toronto law professor, said, "I've never seen the Supreme Court admonish a lawyer in such strong terms."

David Matas, senior legal counsel for B'nai Brith Canada (BBC), called denunciation of the motion "perfectly appropriate" and "all we could have hoped for."

Neither BBC nor CJC was allowed to intervene in this aspect of the case.

Matas believes the main judgment "effectively overrules" the 1994 Supreme Court decision that acquitted suspected Nazi-era war criminal Imre Finta. "It says the law on which Finta was acquitted is wrong." The Finta decision, which is referred to in the Mugesera judgment, made it impractical to prosecute war criminals in Canada because it established such high standards of proof.

"This judgment establishes that all the prosecution has to show is intent and that the crime was widespread among a population. It's much more realistic, and more in line with international law," Matas said.

He believes this will make it easier to prosecute modern-day crimes of incitement to hatred and genocide and crimes against humanity. It's too late to try Nazi war criminals, but it might goad the cabinet to revoke the citizenship of the accused in the five pending cases, Matas said.

"The Mugesera judgment removes all legal difficulties set up by Finta. It has broken through the culture of impunity. It means Canada should not be able to provide sanctuary for those guilty of crimes against humanity. The cabinet can and should follow the lead of the court."

Matas is gratified is that the court accepted a number of B'nai Brith arguments: that the Federal Court of Appeal, which set aside Mugesera's deportation order, misjudged its role by unnecessarily retrying the case on facts that were already established. The court also accepted that the crime of incitement to genocide does not require a direct causal link to acts of genocide and that the crime of incitement to hatred does not require proving a causal link to actual hatred, Matas said.

"The court also accepted that a tribunal must take into account the nature of the target audience and not just use the yardstick of a reasonable observer in determining whether the offence of incitement to hatred is proven. The court also accepted that the case for the crime against humanity of persecution had been made even if the crime against humanity of counselling murder had not."

Morgan thinks the judgment may facilitate prosecution of more recent crimes, but will not have any direct effect on the pending Nazi war criminal cases.

"[It] infuses real meaning into Canada's determination not to be seen as a haven for purveyors of hateful and violent messages, which carry within them the seeds of crimes against humanity and genocide. Residence in Canada is a precious privilege that must never be open to those who entered our country by misrepresenting their involvement in such heinous crimes."

Edmonton Jews welcome IAF members

Among the high-ranking officials who stopped in Edmonton on the way to Cold Lake was Maj.-Gen. Amos Yadlin, the Israel Defence Forces' defence and armed forces attaché to Washington, D.C. He expressed appreciation to the Canadian Forces for inviting Israel to train at Cold Lake, giving the Israeli pilots the opportunity to fly over new terrain and wide spaces without entering foreign territory.

He said the exercises offered quality training, adding that while every nation learns from the others, he felt the other nations participating had a very high appreciation for the skills brought by the IAF members.

Beth Israel Synagogue hosted Brig.-Gen. Amir Eshel, head of the IAF air division, and Brig.-Gen. Ilan Baram, the IAF attaché at the Israeli Embassy in Washington, at a Shabbat dinner, where the two spoke about the fly-past by Israeli jets at ceremonies commemorating the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz.

Asked how nations are chosen to participate in the annual exercise, Lieut. Sonia Dumouchel Connock, a public affairs officer at 4 Wing, said letters of invitation are sent via military attachés to nations throughout the world.

"We are reaching out to everyone all over the globe, and every year we try to expand our partnership by bringing new countries on board," Connock said.

She said key critera for participation are a willingness to come and the ability to conduct "coalition operations" with other nations.

The IAF had been invited for the past three years, but this was the first time it could attend, she said, adding "the IAF has stated an interested in participating in other Maple Flag exercises in the years to come."

While Israel's participation drew little notice in the mainstream media, there was negative reaction from Palestinian and Arab groups in Canada. In both the community press and on the Internet, they condemned the Canadian government for inviting an air force they say has been used against civilians in Gaza and the West Bank.

Military spokespeople said Arab nations were also invited and that among the seven countries who sent military personnel to observe were the United Arab Emirates and Qatar.

Toward the end of the six-week period, more than 150 members of Edmonton's Jewish community boarded three buses to head to Cold Lake to visit the IAF members and see their planes up close.

They were shown a video presentation of the flight from Israel and the IAF's activities over Alberta, and Lieut.-Col. Nir Koren, commander of the Israeli contingent, talked about the excellent training his personnel received and the warm hospitality they got from the Canadians and other nations at Cold Lake.

He also expressed his pride in the Jews of Edmonton for making the IAF members feel as if they were with family, despite being far from home.

After words of appreciation to the Israelis by Clyde Hurtig, president of the Jewish Federation of Edmonton, and Shoshana Pollack, the liaison between the IAF and the Edmonton community, the Edmontonians and the Israelis ate lunch, which was followed by Israeli music and dancing.

The last two hours of the trip were spent in a hangar and on one of the runways, where community members climbed onto the F-16's and got the opportunity to sit in the cockpits.

Four-way conference to be held

Rothschild said Israel is well aware of China's tense relations with the West, driven partly by Beijing's sale of military know-how and hardware to Iran. "That will be in the back of Israel's mind," he said.

Rothschild is now busy organizing a four-way conference in Toronto on pharmaceutical development, to involve Canada, China, India and Israel, under the auspices of the Medical and Related Sciences (MaRS) Discovery District, a non-profit project designed to bring scientists and the private sector together.

Keeping the spotlight on Abbas

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Two items this week:

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' complaint, after his summit meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, that Israel is putting undue pressure on him to confront and disarm the Palestinian terrorist groups was the subject of the Toronto Star editorial "A Mideast message" (June 23).

The Star cited the case of Wafa al-Biss, the troubled young woman from Gaza who, on the eve of the summit, attempted to cross into Israel and detonate a suicide bomb in the Israeli hospital where she was being treated for severe burns. The Star argued that since al-Biss was recruited by the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, a faction within Abbas' own Fatah party, "this is a group that Abbas should be able to control, if he can control anyone."

The Star said the al-Biss incident "lends colour to Sharon's claim that Abbas could do more to suppress extremism. This is extremely important as Israel prepares to uproot 9,000 settlers from Gaza and parts of the West Bank."

The Star understands that Abbas wants to avoid the risk of civil war if he takes on terrorist organizations such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Nonetheless, it insisted that "tough and swift action against extremist holdouts" is required for Israel to be able to deliver more concessions to the Palestinians in order to help improve their daily lives.

Without mentioning the internationally backed "road map" peace plan, the Star 's position is very much in tune with the road map's prerequisites: that Palestinian extremism and violence be checked and that terrorist groups be disarmed and dismantled if progress toward Israeli-Palestinian reconciliation is to be attained.

Without firm action by Abbas, many Israeli analysts fear that the recent spike in Palestinian violence will grow, as will the lawlessness that prevails in much of the West Bank and Gaza.

Abbas has declared the need for Palestinians to desist from violence. But, as Robert Satloff wrote in the New Republic (reprinted as "Condi's false note," National Post, June 27): "Unless Abbas is prodded to use the power of his position to impose – through force, if necessary – the principle of 'one authority, one law, one gun,' then Palestinian statehood stands no chance."

Satloff wrote that U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice squandered an opportunity during her recent visit to Ramallah to insist that Abbas crack down on the terrorist groups and impose the rule of law in the territories.

Rice, said Satfloff, "could have reminded Palestinians that no state survives long when militias, terrorist groups and gangs run unchecked through the streets; she could have added that [U.S.] President [George W.] Bush's two-state vision does not extend to the creation of a terrorist safe-haven on Israel's southern and eastern flanks. Alas, she said none of that."

Satloff criticized the United States government for acquiescing in Abbas' strategy of trying to co-opt terror groups instead of confronting them. Expecting anything less, said Satloff, is "tragic."

In "The Principle of Hope: Samir Kassir, 1960-2005" (The Nation, July 4), Adam Shatz provides some fascinating details about Lebanese journalist Samir Kassir, who was murdered on June 2 – almost certainly by Syrian agents – for his outspoken opposition to Syria's occupation of Lebanon.

According to Shatz, in addition to advocating democracy and criticizing Arab dictatorships, Kassir was rare in that he was also "a scathing critic of anti-Semitism."

Shatz faults the American left for largely ignoring Kassir's murder, in part because his views "converged inconveniently with the anti-Syrian agenda" of the U.S. government. Wrote Shatz: "Imagine the outcry from the left if a man of [Kassir's] stature had been cut down by American or Israeli arms." Indeed.

Government rejects further delay in pullout

By ALUF BENN and MAZAL MUALEM
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The government has overwhelmingly rejected an appeal by Likud Agriculture Minister Yisrael Katz that would have postponed the disengagement by three months.

Nineteen ministers voted against the appeal on Sunday, and only three Likud ministers supported it – Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Health Minister Danny Naveh and Katz. Other Likud ministers – Tzachi Hanegbi, Silvan Shalom and Limor Livnat – rejected the motion.

Netanyahu said he will skip Wednesday's Knesset vote on National Religious Party member of Knesset Zevulun Orlev's bill to postpone the disengagement for a year, in order to avoid voting against it.

Shalom said that in order to avoid exacerbating the rift in the Likud party, if some ministers choose not to participate in the Knesset vote on Wednesday, they should not be penalized.

Netanyahu will not vote in favour of the bill Wednesday, because voting for a bill that the cabinet has decided to oppose would entail his dismissal from the government. The cabinet has already decided to oppose Wednesday's bill.

Netanyahu said in a statement issued by his office that in skipping Wednesday's vote, he would be following the example set by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in 1997, when Sharon was a minister in Netanyahu's government. At that time, Sharon voted in the cabinet against the Hebron agreement that would place a temporary international presence in Hebron. He then skipped the Knesset vote on the pact to avoid having to vote in favour.

However, Sharon's office reacted furiously to this week's announcement. Members of Sharon's staff noted that under Article 11 of the 1949 Transition Law, a minister who either votes against the government or "misses the vote" will be considered to have resigned, unless the prime minister decides otherwise.

But Netanyahu's associates insisted that the law does not obligate a minister who skips a vote to resign. "Ministers are often absent from votes, it happens every day," said one. "The Transition Law is no longer valid, because the Basic Law on Government has changed."

In any case, his office insisted, he does not intend to back down: "He will act as Sharon did in 1997."

Sharon's staff declined to rule out the possibility that Sharon would fire Netanyahu. "Let's wait until Wednesday," said one. "At the moment, [firing Netanyahu] is not on the agenda. What's important is the disengagement, not some negligible act that has no significance. The disengagement has a majority in the cabinet and the Knesset... and that's what matters."

Sharon's staff suggested that Netanyahu's decision resulted from polls showing that MK Uzi Landau is gaining on Netanyahu in the race for the Likud leadership. Landau is the leader of the Likud MKs who have opposed disengagement from the start, whereas Netanyahu has often spoken against it but consistently voted in favour. Therefore, Sharon's people said, Netanyahu now feels a need to veer to the right.

Netanyahu's associates rejected this explanation. "Netanyahu views this vote as a matter of conscience of the first rank," one said.

Settler leaders meet to prevent pullout violence

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Jewish settler leaders and rabbis were to meet Monday to draw up a code of conduct designed to prevent violence during opposition protests to the upcoming Gaza pullout, settler leaders said.

The initiative was launched after recent protests against the planned pullout turned violent, raising fears of greater confrontation during the evacuation of the Gaza Strip and four West Bank settlements, scheduled to begin in mid-August.

"Attempts to physically harm people, to attack roads are things we cannot accept," right-wing lawmaker Effie Eitam of the National Religious Zionist Renewal Party told Israel Radio.

"They are forbidden both by the law and by Jewish tradition, and they do not help the struggle," he said.

"In this charter, we would have a clause stipulating that there be no weapons in the evacuation area," Eitam said. "We are trying to ensure that, even if there is a flare-up of feelings, there is a good chance of preventing a catastrophe."

The planned charter calls for nonviolence, voluntary collection of settlers' weapons and verbal restraint against the security forces, he said.

Eitam said a "red line" was crossed recently when extremists took over buildings in Gaza, clashing with security forces and Palestinians. The opponents also scattered spikes and oil on the main Jerusalem-Tel Aviv highway.

New opinion polls showed a sharp rise in support for the pullout after the violence.

The code will also call on settlers to refrain from "acts of provocation or revenge against Palestinians," the Ma'ariv daily reported.

However, Eitam said settlers would step up nonviolent protests.

"We will fight a determined fight, but not a violent one," he said.

Three months ago, Eitam moved with his family to the Gaza Strip as an act of support for the pullout opponents.

Settlers slated for evacuation reacted coolly to the proposal, denying that they presented a security threat.

Reform Jews in Germany fight for recognition

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BERLIN — Jan Muhlstein, the president of the Union of Progressive Jews, is engaged in a battle he thought was won nearly two centuries ago.

In Germany, the cradle of liberal Judaism, Jews like Muhlstein, incredibly and ironically enough, are still fighting for recognition, acceptance and equality.

Reform Judaism emerged in Germany in the early 1800s. It dominated Jewish religious life here until the Nazis seized power in 1933. With their defeat in 1945, a trickle of German Jews began returning to their former homes. But the community was basically rebuilt and refashioned by Jews from eastern Europe, particularly Poland. Their Orthodox Judaism alienated Jews such as Muhlstein.

"I came from a liberal tradition," explained Muhlstein, president of Beth Shalom, a Reform congregation in Munich with some 200 members.

Until about a decade ago, Reform Jews in Germany usually attended synagogue services led by U.S. army chaplains. But with the establishment of the Union of Progressive Jews in 1997, an affiliate of the World Union for Progressive Judaism, they were no longer content with the status quo.

Creating their own communities, they pressed the Central Council of Jews in Germany – which represents the interests of some 100,000 members – for recognition.

The Union of Progressive Jews has a membership of approximately 4,500, the majority from the former Soviet Union, in 20 communities served by four rabbis. There are Reform communities in cities running the gamut from Hannover and Cologne to Hamburg and Mainz, but none in Berlin or Frankfurt. Muhlstein predicted that, within a few years, there will be 30 such communities throughout Germany.

Yet with no permanent shul at their disposal, services are still conducted in rented rooms. "We don't have the financial means to build a synagogue," said Muhlstein, a 55-year-old technical magazine editor who was born in what was then Czechoslovakia and immigrated to western Germany after the failure of liberal reforms in Czechoslovakia in 1969.

Asked why Reform Jews around the world have not come to their assistance, Muhlstein said, "It's hard to explain that the restoration of Jewish life in Germany is important. Jews abroad don't realize you can find living Judaism in Germany."

The union, however, received overseas help in building a rabbinic seminary at the University of Potsdam, the Abraham Geiger College, which was founded in 2000.

Jan Muhlstein

The college, which plans to ordain its first two rabbis in 2006, was funded by Reform Jews from the United States and Canada. Muhlstein said the former spiritual leader of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto, German-born Gunther Plaut, was of help as well.

As far as its broad goals are concerned, the union is seeking membership in and acceptance by the Central Council of Jews in Germany.

"We want to sit at the table when decisions are made and to be treated as an equal partner," said Muhlstein. "And we want state aid."

Last year, in what could be construed as a victory for Reform Judaism in Germany, the union entered into negotiations with the council. "The council has started the process of integrating us," said Muhlstein. "We already have received financial support for our youth movement. But we have to fight for every step."

"It's a game," said Irith Raub-Michelsohn, the union's 51-year-old executive director, who was born in Tel Aviv and immigrated to western Germany in 1956 with her parents.

Muhlstein believes the council will eventually grant the union full membership, "not because it wants to but because it has to."

He claims the council's two top appointed officials, Paul Spiegel and Salomon Korn, are in favour of religious diversity and granting all streams of Judaism in Germany equal rights.

But several council officials do not share their openness to Reform Judaism, he added. "And so there is a gap between official statements and practices," Muhlstein observed.

The union's relations with the federal government also tend to be complex.

Two years ago, the council and the government signed a historic treaty putting the Jewish community on a legal par with Germany's main Christian churches. As a result, the council became eligible for $3 million (US) in annual federal aid.

The union did not have access to a share of these funds, and threatened to sue the German government for discrimination in its contract with the council.

Last year, Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder said he would not intervene in the dispute. But in the face of pressure from Muhlstein, Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism in the United States, discussed the matter with Germany's ambassador to the U.S., Wolfgang Ischinger, in Washington, D.C.

Last month, the issue was addressed yet again when a delegation of international Reform leaders met with Schroeder, Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer and Interior Minister Otto Schily in Berlin.

Keeping this meeting in mind, Muhlstein said, "We're looking for a solution to avoid a law suit."

"The federal government is really interested in supporting us," noted Raub-Michelsohn, who is also president of the Jewish community in Bielefeld.

In the meantime, she disclosed, the government has begun contributing funds to the Abraham Geiger College.

Muhlstein hopes that the conflict with the council can be settled amicably, and that the union can take its rightful place. As he put it: "What we need is a unified community, with all streams of Judaism working together in harmony."

Stabbings halt pride parade

Jerusalem's gay pride parade was halted last Thursday evening after a haredi man stabbed three participants, Ha'aretz reported. The assailant ran into the crowd, stabbed one man, moved on to a young woman stabbing her hand, and then lightly wounded a third man. Some 200 haredi protesters faced 2,000 participants, according to police estimates, and 13 protesters were arrested. On June 26, the Jerusalem District Court ruled against Jerusalem Mayor Uri Lupolianski's decision to ban the parade, and fined him 30,000 shekels ($6,500 US), citing the gay community's right to freedom of expression. The mayor had argued that the annual event offended religious sensibilities in the holy city. Religious lawmakers called for the Orthodox community to pay the fine.

Hezbollah kills soldier

An Israeli soldier was killed in clashes with Hezbollah. Four other soldiers were also wounded in clashes last week between Israeli troops and members of the Shiite terror group. The clashes began when Hezbollah fighters infiltrated northern Israel. Israeli soldiers responded with gunfire. Hezbollah also fired mortars into the Shebaa Farms region. Israel responded with an airstrike on Hezbollah positions in southern Lebanon.

The long arm of justice

Israeli security forces captured a Palestinian police officer who allegedly took part in the 2000 lynching of two army reservists. The Shin Bet lifted a gag order on the arrest, which took place in May, of a Gaza-born man who worked in the Ramallah police station at the time of the lynching. Two Israeli army reservists who strayed into the West Bank city by mistake were taken to the station, only to be beaten to death by a mob that was allowed in. Televised images of the lynching in October 2000, were broadcast worldwide, and Israeli authorities swore to bring the perpetrators to justice.

Sharon confirms Paris visit

Ariel Sharon confirmed that he would accept French President Jacques Chirac's invitation to visit France at the end of July. The Israeli prime minister's day-and-a-half visit is likely to begin July 27, a source close to Sharon told Agence France Presse. A protest march against Sharon's visit is scheduled for July 9 in Paris. This will be Sharon's second official visit to France as prime minister.

Soldiers seek legal advice

Twenty-five Israeli soldiers have sought legal advice on refusing orders to carry out the looming Gaza Strip withdrawal, attorney Shai Galili said. He told Army Radio that 25 conscripts "from all sectors of the country" had contacted him in case they're court-martialled for insubordination. One client, Cpl. Avi Bieber, was arrested after refusing to help demolish a Gaza building where settlers had barricaded themselves.

Remembering Eli Cohen

Israel honoured its most famous spy 40 years after he was executed in Syria. "Even after 40 years, the wonder at the courage and operational accomplishments of Eli Cohen has remained," Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said at a special memorial ceremony last week. The Egyptian-born Cohen was recruited by the Mossad and planted in Syria, where he gathered information on the political and military echelons considered key to Israel's victory in the 1967 Six Day War. But he never saw that success, as he was discovered and hanged in 1965. Sharon told Cohen's widow, Nadia, that he considered the return of Cohen's remains important to the resumption of peace talks with Syria, which stalled in 2000.

Fence route determined by more than security, state admits

By YUVAL YOAZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has acknowledged for the first time that security was not the only consideration in determining the route of the West Bank separation fence.

Responding to a petition brought to the High Court by the residents of the Palestinian village Azun in the northern West Bank, the state asked for the fence to be left on its original route, previously ruled to be unsuitable, as it would be very expensive to move.

The state's position marks a fundamental change in its legal arguments. Initially, the state claimed security concerns were the sole motivation for erecting the fence, and there were no other considerations.

In its principal ruling on the issue last year, in the Beit Surik affair, the High Court determined the state has no authority to build a fence for political considerations, such as appending land to Israel.

The state's new stance also highlights a major policy change regarding the "temporary" nature of the fence. Until now, the state has claimed that the fence was a short-term measure, and it was possible to move or dismantle the barrier.

The construction of the separation fence has already been completed in the area, and the barrier is fully functional.

In the region north of Qalqilyah, the route creates an enclave where it departs from the 1967 Green Line border and moves eastward to encompass the settlement of Tzofin, as well as much land from the villages of Jayyus and Azun.

Russia drops probe of Jewish group

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
JTA

MOSCOW — Following a storm of protest from Jewish groups and Israeli politicians, Russian officials have dropped a probe into a Russian Jewish group for publishing a religious Jewish book.

But Russian and U.S. Jewish officials warn that those interested in human rights should remain vigilant to prevent similar incidents in the future.

"The fact that the prosecutors have been seriously considering that case for a long time, isn't that a reason for us to be concerned?" said Rabbi Zinovy Kogan, chairman of the Congress of Jewish Religious Organizations and Communities of Russia, the group that was the subject of the probe. "The prosecutors should not make any legal judgments on religious texts. If someone is unhappy with what some of the traditional texts say, this can be a matter of a voluntary discussion between faiths."

The probe was opened after an anti-Semitic letter was circulated earlier this year attacking the text of the Shulchan Aruch legal code as extremist and anti-Christian. The congress had published a short version of the medieval Jewish text.

The probe astonished Israeli officials and heads of international Jewish groups, who said it reminded them of religious persecution under the czar and of religious disputations foisted on Jews by the Catholic church in medieval times.

Mark Levin, executive director of NCSJ: Advocates on Behalf of Jews in Russia, Ukraine, the Baltic States and Eurasia, said it's still unknown what prompted the incident.

"We're all pleased that the investigation was dropped, but it doesn't answer the question of why the investigation was started in the first place," he said. "This is the type of issue that shouldn't occur in a society that is trying to promote tolerance and pluralism."

Levin said his group will emphasize in its meetings with Russian government officials that these types of probes are unacceptable.

Direct pressure on Russia from Israel and local and foreign Jewish groups led to the decision to drop the case, observers in Moscow suggested. Israeli and Russian media also noted that the news about dropping the probe was released during a visit to Moscow by Israel's trade minister, Ehud Olmert. Olmert was in Moscow for talks on economic relations between the two countries.

Rabbi Kogan, who was editor of the Russian edition of the Kitzur Shulchan Aruch, was questioned by legal officials several times this year.

During questioning last week at the prosecutor's office, Rabbi Kogan said he had to make a statement that Jews and Judaism do not have any claims against Christianity. He told JTA that he was surprised to find, among materials in the case, testimony by an academic expert claiming that Judaism regards Christians as idol worshippers.

"If we do not expose such myths, the attacks on us will continue," Rabbi Kogan said, recalling the first time a case against the congress and the Shulchan Aruch was opened by the prosecutor's office of the Basmanny district of Moscow in 2002, when a complaint was filed with authorities claiming the Shulchan Aruch was a "fascist" book.

Expert says children and teens will exercise if it's fun

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

How do you prevent childhood obesity? It's a question many professionals in the health and fitness field are grappling with in this era of fast food and video entertainment.

Helping children improve their eating habits is only part of the solution. Kids also need to become more active.

So how can we lure our small fry away from the tube, MSN and video games before they grow into full-fledged couch potatoes?

Fitness experts Matthew and Felicia Taub of Sensible Fitness Solutions have stepped up to this challenge. These certified personal trainers have a winning approach that's catching on with many youngsters in the Toronto area.

The Taubs believe children will exercise if fitness can be made to be fun.

Indeed, Felicia Taub has been working with a group of 15 girls who are 12 and 13 years old and of varying fitness levels and sizes. They have become so keen on fitness that they've been doing additional training to participate in community runs.

They just completed a five kilometre walk or run in Mount Sinai Hospital's Walk/Run for the Best Medicine.

The girls [trained] for months, says Taub. "We [met] every Sunday for the running clinic. All the girls… built up to walking or walk-running the five kilometre distance. The girls are a dynamite group who are very supportive to one another.

"One of the nicest things is that the girls have really developed a lot of confidence in their abilities and, of course, increased their stamina and skill level."

Most of the girls in the group are in Taub's private fitness classes after school, but she donates her time to the running clinic. "This is a way for Sensible Fitness Solutions to support Mount Sinai and promote heath and fitness in the community," she says.

"More than half of this group started out at an underdeveloped fitness level. They were really out of shape for their age. Some of them couldn't skip for a minute. Now they fall into a much higher level in fitness level. They can follow an above-average fitness routine."

Taub became interested in children's fitness when she was working at a large fitness centre, training adults. "I noticed that they didn't have activities for children. So I set up Kidfitt, special classes to help children improve balance, agility, speed and strength."

She was unable to expand the classes, so she and her husband started private children's classes run out of people's homes. They are about to open a storefront studio – PhyzKids – in the Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue area.

The classes are age and gender specific, says Taub. She works with the girls, her husband leads the boys' classes, she adds.

Many of the girls in the running clinic – in these sessions they do aerobic and circuit training – have been working with Taub for two years, she says. "They have formed close personal relationships with each other. When they come to class, they come to see their friends."

Taub says that her relationship with the girls is also key to their fitness success. "We've developed a high level of trust and intimacy between us and that's an important factor in keeping them motivated in their fitness program."

She explains that genetic and natural skill have a lot of impact on a child's level of fitness, "For some children, it comes naturally. Others really have to work at it."

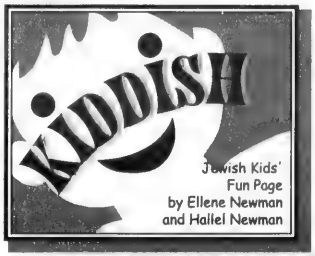
Interactive sports help children become physically fit, but many children lack the skills and confidence to play these team sports. "We tend to work with that kind of child. We also work with very fit kids, but we provide an option for kids that have trouble finding fitness activities."

Taub has several ways to keep children's interest. "We have a lot of music. We have a lot of variety in activities. We work with kids as young as five, so we really have to be focused on the interest level," she says.

"The challenge is – how do you make fitness fun? Even adults get bored with it."

She sets a personal goal with every child; however, she does not recommend dieting. "Children need to cut back on junk and eat healthy foods, but they need parental support to do that."

She says that children should not get fixated with their weight and the number on the scale. "It's not as important as increasing fitness ability. That's our emphasis. We want to see kids active and moving and involved and loving the training."



The Road from Moab

Adapted from Ruth Chapter 1

"That's not Naomi, is it?"

"It can't be!"

The people of Bethlehem stared at the two women approaching the city.

"Oh my! It is Naomi! But look at her! She used to look like a queen, and now…"

"What happened to her husband? Her sons?"

"Her clothes are torn in mourning. Her whole family must have died in Moab."

"Serves them right for abandoning us when we needed them."

"Shh! She'll hear you!"

The crowd fell silent as Naomi and the young woman at her side approached.

Naomi was a shadow of her former self. She was thinner and her face was downcast, creased with worry and grief.

"Naomi," someone greeted her.

"Please don't call me that any more," she replied softly. "Naomi means pleasant. Call me Marah, the bitter one." She resumed walking, and the woman by her side joined her.

The woman's name was Ruth. She was a Moabite princess. At least she used to be. She had been married to one of Naomi's sons in Moab. After the death of Ruth's husband, when Naomi decided to return to Israel, Ruth joined her, but not because things would be better for her there. In Israel, Naomi warned her, they would be paupers. "Go back to Moab, to your sister Orpah, to your family," Naomi urged her, even as they walked to Israel, but Ruth persisted. Her life in Moab had been fun, opulent… and empty. In Naomi she saw light, clarity, dignity, even in her times of grief. Ruth wanted to be a part of Naomi's people, and their God. There was no turning back now.

They're staring at me, Ruth realized, as they continued walking. Straining to listen, she could hear the whispers.

"Who's that?"

"Maybe it's Naomi's servant."

"Impossible. Look at the way she carries herself. Like a princess or something."

"I'll tell you who that is. It's one of Naomi's sons' wives. Can't you tell she's a Moabite?"

"What's she doing here?"

"I bet she came to swipe some of the family fortune. Won't she be surprised to discover that there isn't any."

"Hah! Picture her living in a shack with Naomi! Gleaning sheaves!"

The raucous laughter accosted Ruth's ears. Gleaning sheaves? she wondered. What does that mean? She sighed. My sister Orpah's probably having the time of her life in Moab…

* * *

Ruth left the house early in the morning, tired and hungry. She wasn't going back to Moab. She was going to the fields, to find food for herself and Naomi.

"It's not stealing," Naomi had explained to her. "According to Torah law, produce left behind in fields may be taken by the poor. Ruth, you should not be doing this. Let me go instead."

But Ruth had insisted. Not wasting any time, she began scooping up leftover stalks of barley. It was laborious. And degrading. And by then, the sun was burning so fiercely. The minutes turned into hours. Too exhausted to continue, Ruth took a short break in the cool shade of one of the many makeshift huts scattered through the fields. Then she resumed her gathering. Her life and Naomi's life depended on it.

"Are you thirsty?"

Ruth looked up. A man was standing next to her. "Yes," was all she could say. She was ready to collapse.

"Come with me," the man instructed. He led her to a shaded table, laden with food and drink. The harvesters were seated around it, eating and drinking. "Take what you want," he smiled, as Ruth gratefully obliged, "and feel free to come back whenever you want."

She waited for him to leave before asking one of the harvesters, "Who was that?"

"Who's that?" he laughed. "You don't know who Boaz is? He owns the place! He was asking us about you. 'Who is this girl? She seems foreign, but she behaves so modestly. Ah, I shouldn't be telling you these things. Forget I said anything.'"

* * *

"Ruth," exclaimed Naomi. That's a lot of barley for one day! In whose field did you get all this?"

"Boaz."

"Boaz? God bless him. He's related to us, you know. He is our redeemer."

"Our what?"

"Oh, Ruth, you have a lot to learn… When someone dies without children, as your husband did, he leaves nothing to be remembered by. The custom in Israel is that his wife marries one of his close relatives and the children she has from him carry on the name of the husband."

"You mean they name them after him?"

"Not necessarily. But since they were born from his former wife, when people see the children they remember him. Boaz is our redeemer. Your husband's redeemer. Your redeemer."

The words echoed in Ruth's head throughout the harvest season. Through the boiling days spent scrambling for food. Through the quiet nights in Naomi's shack…

* * *

"Ruth, do you remember what I told you about Boaz being our redeemer?"

"Of course."

"The harvest season has ended. You won't be going to the fields anymore, and you won't see Boaz again."

"Yes?"

"It's time you ask him to marry you."

"What? Me? Why would he want to marry me? I'm a pauper. A nothing. Boaz marrying me. Ha."

"You never know God's ways, Ruth, you never know. Tonight, Boaz will be by the fields, guarding the harvested grain from thieves. Find him. Ask him. You never know."

"If you insist," responded Ruth, making her final trip to the fields of Boaz…

The rest is history. She did marry Boaz and they had a son named Obed. Obed grew up and had a son named Yishai. And Yishai's son was David, the same David who became king over all Israel.

Playwright brings Toronto Jewish culture to Edinburgh Fringe

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Evan Placey is determined to bring the trivialities of Jewish Toronto life to an international audience this summer when he presents Phone Play at the Edinburgh Festival Fringe.

Placey, the 22-year-old playwright and director describes the play as "the epitome of growing up in Thornhill."

It takes place on one cold January afternoon in Toronto and showcases eight characters having separate phone conversations that don't overlap with each other, but each character is connected in some way.

"It's a play about the catastrophes that happen in one day in Toronto that are beautifully intertwined," said Alexandra Parravano, 20, who plays Sheila, a Jewish, GAP-managing mother who doesn't believe in customer service.

"She's so much fun," Parravano said about her character, Sheila. "Audiences love her and I love playing her. She's abrasive, she makes fun of people's names, she's quick, witty and sassy.

"She's not tactful," she continued. "But she's so lovable. I feel so honoured that I get to play her."

With a plot line that has one character waiting at Finch subway station in the dead of winter for her friend who is busy having phone sex with a stranger, to more serious issues that address teen pregnancy and HIV infection, Placey said this play is meant to show the audience that we focus too much on trivialities.

"The show is a comedy with dark, underlying messages, but it's very light. It's not a critique on Jewish culture and it's not religious. It just gives people a chance to laugh at themselves," said Placey, who grew up in a Jewish home in Thornhill.

But, he said, the play does mock the Jewish suburban culture and makes fun of how obsessive people have become over certain trends such as going to Second Cup for coffee, Milestone's for belinis and buying "Tiffany's bracelets that every Jewish girl in Toronto must have."

Phone Play made its debut three years ago at Earl Haig Secondary School's One Act Play Festival while both Placey and Parravano were students in the school's Claude Watson Arts Program.

After playing to sold-out audiences, Placey and his cast were invited to perform as part of the Sears Ontario Drama Festival in 2003. Two years later, Phone Play made its UK premiere in Edinburgh, and in August the play will be performed at the world-renowned Edinburgh Festival Fringe.

While both Placey and Parravano had concerns about whether the Toronto Jewish jokes would translate to an international audience, Placey said that once the play was previewed in Edinburgh last February, he realized that Jewish or not, anyone can relate to the humour and the overall message.

Parravano insists that she's not even Jewish and she still found that she shared similar tendencies with the characters in the play, such as owning the trendy Tiffany's bracelet with the heart-shaped charm.

"The bottom line is that they are all funny characters that anyone can appreciate," she said."The characters are very cartoony, larger than life. They are exaggerated, but they are well-rounded characters that have a lot of depth."

Placey is also confident that the play's message will translate to an international audience. He said anyone who has ever had a cellphone can relate to the subject matter on some level.

"We've lost all sense of communication. With pagers and cellphones and e-mail, the new technology has actually limited communication. No one is actually communicating," he said.

He added that these days people have a more intimate relationship with answering machines than with the people they are trying to reach.

"Ten years ago, if you couldn't reach someone at home, you couldn't reach them until they got home. Today, we all have cellphones, pagers, carphones. The play forces you to look at what we've become, but in a hilarious way," Parravano said.

Anarchy smiles on the Royal Mile: The cast of Phone Play in Edinburgh.

"I want people to be entertained, to laugh, to think," the director said. "I hope this is a play that people will remember."

The Edinburgh Festival Fringe runs from August 7-29. For more information, visit www.edfringe.com or www.phoneplay.org.uk.

Sephardic love songs featured in Holocaust survival play

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

In an ambitious play that attempts to tell the tale of playwright Liliane Atlan's family and their struggle to survive during and after the Holocaust, Les Mers Rouges (The Red Seas) encorporates Sephardi love songs with characters based on real people and testimony.

Kalli Paakspuu, a Genie Award winning director, had the difficult task of turning this challenging script – with actors that become different characters throughout the play as it spans over several decades – into something comprehensive.

One of the techniques that separates this play from others that deal with the same theme is that the characters talk directly to the audience.

Eyal Bitton, the musical director of Les Mers Rouges said while the play does feature beautiful Sephardi music, it "is not musical theatre. There is no band on stage. The music that is featured is Ladino music, a mix of Spanish and Hebrew."

He explained that the music, which comes from the Spanish Inquisition period, is incorporated into the actions of the characters in a realistic way.

"The way that a mother might sing a song while preparing for Shabbat, or the same way that we might sing in the shower, these characters sing in this fashion. I think it works."

Bitton, who is the Beth Tikvah choir director, said becoming a part of this play had more to do with being at the right place at the right time than anything else.

He recalled the circumstances that lead to his involvement with the play, which has been performed at Le Festival d'Avignon, France, a world renowned theatre festival. He took his wife, an actress, to audition for Les Mers Rouges during a casting call in Toronto.

He waited for her in a stairwell, listened to her audition and just as she finished – and got the part – she approached her husband to tell him the director wanted to see him.

"She happened to need a musical director. I looked through the script then and there, and I said, 'I know this song, I'm familiar with that song,' and I was hired the next day."

He said that while he loves his job at the synagogue, the majority of the music at the shul is Ashkenazi. This play gave him an opportunity to work on Sephardi music, which is more a part of him.

"This play appeals to me as a Sephardi Jew as it outlines the experience of Greek Jews during the Holocaust. I was really attracted to the idea that the playwright wanted to incorporate Sephardi music into the play," Bitton said.

"I, as a Moroccan, was unaware of the experience of Greek Jews and the larger experience of the Holocaust. That was fascinating to me."

Bitton said what makes this Holocaust play different from others is that it exposes the audience to a part of the Holocaust that is often overlooked. He added that of the Jews that perished in the Holocaust, Greek Jews, as a group, were one of the most devastated.

"I think Ashkenazim watching this will learn a great deal and Sephardim watching this will feel more self-worth.

"If you want to remember the six million, you want to remember all the six million."

What he likes about musical theatre, although this play, he insists, is not a musical, is the idea that a play has the ability to take an audience on a journey.

"When you hear a pop song, you can be transported for two or three minutes, but a play has the ability to transport an audience on a longer journey."

But what Bitton loves most about theatre is the way "one can use a minimum amount of space to communicate an infinite number of things."

He said that the subject matter is heavy, but expects that the audience will appreciate it for what it is.

Les Mers Rouges will run at the Artword Theatre in Toronto from July 7-16. For more information call 416-967-1528.

JONATHAN SAFRAN FOER AND ANITA DIAMANT TO APPEAR AT AUTHORS FESTIVAL

Popular American-Jewish writers Jonathan Safran Foer (Everything Is Illuminated) and Anita Diamant (The Red Tent) are on the preliminary list of authors scheduled to appear at this year's International Festival of Authors at Toronto's Harbourfront in October, the festival has announced.

A festival press release described Foer, 28, as a "wunderkid" and said he would read from his new novel, Extremely Loud and Incredibly Close. The book centres on Oskar Schell, a precocious nine-year-old New Yorker whose father was killed in the World Trade Centre on September 11.

Diamant, a regular contributor to the Boston Globe, has written numerous works of non-fiction and fiction and is perhaps best known for The Red Tent, a retelling of the biblical story of Dinah, told from her perspective and the point of view of the women around her. Diamant will read from The Last Days of Dogtown, a new novel released just last week.

Another confirmed Jewish-American festival participant is David Rakoff, who was born in Toronto but left for New York as a teenager. An actor, essayist and journalist, he is best known for Fraud, a collection of essays about "impersonating Sigmund Freud and climbing icy mountains in cheap loafers." He reads from Don't Get Too Comfortable, a new collection of essays.

The festival's preliminary list also includes Vikram Seth, Julian Barnes, Neil Bissoondath, David Gilmour, John Irving, Robert Kroetsch and Tim Winton and many others. The 26th annual International Festival of Authors is scheduled for Oct. 19 to 29. www.harbourfrontcentre.com

The Lost Art of Yiddish Dancing: Chicago-based Steve Weintraub and Toronto-based Helen Winkler, both of whom have strong backgrounds in Jewish dance, present a one-day workshop in Yiddish dance here this month.

Traditionally performed to klezmer music, Yiddish dances were once a staple of Jewish weddings in eastern Europe but were one of the many cultural casualties associated with modernity and the Holocaust. With the recent revival in klezmer music and Yiddish, however, musicians have been interviewing Holocaust survivors and others who remember the dances, with the aim of reviving the lost art of Yiddish dancing.

The workshop covers the basics, including simple improvised dances, folk dances, a Jewish square dance and a pantomime dance known as the Broiges Tants. It culminates in a model klezmer wedding.

Bathurst JCC, Studio Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. Morning session 10 a.m. to noon, $10. Afternoon session 1:30 to 4:30 p.m., $15. Both sessions $20. Evening party 7 to 10 p.m., $6. No previous dance experience required. Sunday, July 24. Registration details at www.yiddishdance. com. Teme Kernerman, 416-636-1880, ext. 364.

Names in the News: Prominent arts patron and social activist Bluma Appel received an honorary Dora Mavor Moore award at the June 27th awards ceremony in Toronto.

Born and raised in Montreal, Appel learned from her father, Jack Levitt, that sharing their good fortune was a family duty. She has been an avid longtime supporter of the Canadian Opera Company, CanStage, the National Gallery, Necessary Angel Theatre Company, Opera Atelier, the Royal Ontario Museum and other arts organizations.

An officer of the Order of Canada, she is also founder of the Canadian Psychiatric Awareness Committee and a supporter of Canadian AIDS research. She and husband Bram Appel have two sons and five grandchildren.

Play written by local actor to become a feature film

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Only 26, Ottawa native Rosa Laborde is an accomplished actor and playwright.

In fact, her stage play, Sugar, has been optioned as a screenplay and is set to be shot in a few months as a feature film directed by Paul Cade, who directed the movie Angels Don't Sleep Here. Cade was so inspired by Laborde's acting, he wrote a new character into the film for her to portray.

The Oxford School of Drama graduate will be seen next in Lust's Labour's Lost: A Rock Musical written by Brock Simpson. The production is described as a contemporary musical adaptation of Shakespeare's whimsical comedy Lust's Labour's Lost. It premieres at the Tarragon Theatre Mainspace on July 7 and continues on July 8, 10, 11, 12, 15 and 17, as part of the Toronto Fringe Festival. The cast also includes Andrew Currie, Andrew Pifko, Krista Sutton, David Frisch and Melissa-Jane Shaw.

"Lust's Labour's Lost: A Rock Musical takes place in Haliburton, Ont. – it is like a battle of the bands. It is a complete rock musical – the perfect summer show," says Laborde.

"I play the little Spaniard. I'm a woman who dresses as a man. She is a scholar of Elizabethan phonetics and morphology – the evolution of words. She introduces herself as Don Adriano Armado do Universidad de Barcelona, PhD."

Pronouncing this long Latin name should be easy for Laborde, whose mother was exiled from Spanish-speaking Chile in South America, after the coup of 1973. Her mother moved to Ottawa, met her Jewish father, and converted to Judaism before marrying.

The marriage was over in less than two years. When Laborde's mother took ill, her great-grandmother came from Chile to take care of her for a year. In her great-grandmother's honour, she took her last name. She says it was a "spiritual" thing.

"The truth is, the name comes from my great-grandmother's great-great- great-great grandfather who fled France during the Spanish Inquisition because he was Jewish," says Laborde. "During my mother's conversion, she brought in proof that in the line of her paternal heritage, she actually had Jewish roots. Laborde, in its own way, ends up being a Jewish name."

Laborde's many past acting stage credits include Svengali at the Theatre Centre and The Source, the first play Laborde wrote, which premiered at the 2002 Rhubarb! Festival at the Buddies in Bad Times Theatre. It was named outstanding new play by NOW magazine. Her recent film and television appearances include Rescue, 72 Hours, Missing, Street Time, Puppets Who Kill and Doc.

In addition, Laborde is collaborating with Simpson in writing a musical satire called The Ugly Duckling. She's looking forward to coming back to the Tarragon in February 2006 to act in Leo, a play that she wrote about Chile before the coup.

"I don't have a preference between writing and acting – they are both really different. I absolutely love performing, but as an actor, I don't get to choose the words that I say… As a writer, I can actually say what I want to send out into the world, the messages that I'm thinking about," says Laborde, who in her spare time enjoys teaching yoga and going on road trips – a favourite destination being Algonquin Park, to camp with her partner, television writer and director Ian Carpenter.

A comedy based on the Bible plays the Fringe

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

The mere mention of the Bible is a reminder of stern laws and dramatic action, but Elan Farbiarz is giving the ultimate bestseller a comedic makeover.

As part of the Toronto Fringe Festival, Farbiarz is directing and acting in The Bible: The Complete Word of God Abridged, running July 6, 8, 10, 12, 13, 15 and 16 at Tarragon Theatre Mainspace.

The Fringe is known for staging edgy works and Farbiarz's play is no different. This show, adapted from the original script by The Reduced Shakespeare Company in Massachusetts, flies through the Old and New Testaments in 60 minutes. Almost every scene is peppered with jokes that show how that archaic age is an easy target for comedy, Farbiarz says.

Diversity is part of the play's DNA, since Farbiarz, 22, is Jewish, actor Tim Bolen is Catholic and actor Dave Lapsley is a theology major. That shared knowledge allows the group "to make fun of everything," Farbiarz declares.

He says "every person can watch this show and laugh, no matter whether they're Jewish, Christian or Muslim."

The laughs don't just ripple from parodying biblical verse. Farbiarz mentions how the play will incorporate song, slapstick and wordplay. "We want the audience to be surprised by everything they see," he says. "We want to shock them."

And who better to lead this daring show than someone who knows it inside out? Before Farbiarz moved to Toronto, he performed a 10-minute snippet of The Bible at high school competitions in Fort Lauderdale, Fla. The play won a regional award, and Farbiarz later staged it at a state theatre festival. It would seem he is obsessed with the production.

"I love the writing," Farbiarz says. "There are many extremely funny and witty lines."

He is also returning to the Fringe in his first directorial role. Last year, he acted in You Can't Live on Cute Forever, a comedy about a dysfunctional Jewish family. This time around, Farbiarz is relishing the chance to be in charge. "I can pick my own projects, and make sure the audiences leave happy," he says.

For tickets to The Bible: The Complete Word of God Abridged, visit www.wordogodabridged.com or call 416-967-1528.

One-man show tackles Mideast conflict at the Fringe

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

One early morning last week Daniel Thau-Eleff called from Montreal where he had just wrapped up a six-show stint at the Montreal Fringe Festival.

"This last show was my strongest one yet," says a tired, but excited Thau-Eleff. He's quick to point out that 170 people saw his show, Three Ring Circus: Israel, The Palestinians and My Jewish Identity in Montreal. His first performance drew 15 people, but his last had more than 50.

The increase in attendance wasn't due to a lack of choice at the fringe, but because of Three Ring's positive reviews and more likely than not, its controversial subject matter. Thau-Eleff's "coming of age story" deals mainly with his ideas on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"Two years ago I decided to write a show and I kind of went through a political u-turn where I'd always been a general supporter of Israel, but I didn't know much about this conflict," says the Winnipegger, relaying how he came to write a play criticizing the Israeli government and its policies.

"This Jewish anti-occupation group formed in Winnipeg and that opened my eyes to other possibilities. I found myself not only sympathetic with the Palestinian cause, but quite publicly sympathetic, and it led to a couple of interesting things that people will see in my show."

While the Israeli-Palestinian debate is always a sensitive one among Jews, the former Joseph Wolinksy Collegiate student says his play isn't all politics – it's also about women.

"The introduction I've been giving people is it's an hour of me talking to Jewish people about politics and girls," he says.

The cast of Three Ring Circus consists of one actor – Thau-Eleff. Not only does Thau-Eleff play a number of characters throughout the hour, but he also felt it was important to perform as himself, so he could be honest about the play's themes.

"On some level we're tackling the subject of the Middle East, and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in a very roundabout, but very honest way. I needed to say, 'I'm Daniel Thau-Eleff and here's my stories,' and to go through these stories with the audience together. Somehow I needed to establish that level of trust."

From reviews to awards, it's apparent that whatever the University of Winnipeg theatre grad is doing, he's succeeding. Last year Thau-Eleff received an award for best new Fringe play at the Winnipeg Fringe Festival, and one Winnipeg Free Press reviewer likened the play's content to "Woody Allen, Noam Chomsky and Sigmund Freud all rolled into one."

However, not all the reaction has been positive. Thau-Eleff says that much of the negative response has come from people who haven't even seen his play.

"There's a negative response as well, but it's almost exclusively among people who have not seen the show. Particularly in Winnipeg where I've got a bit of a reputation now, there's criticism of the show, people being offended by the show, people being angry about it, but a lot of these people haven't seen it."

Thau-Eleff's response to those who haven't seen the play, but still criticize it, is to actually come see it.

"To those [people who won't see the play] I will be communicating the exact opposite of the message I want to communicate. Who knows what message they're getting – that I'm pro this, hate this, anti about this. If they come see the show they'll hear what I'm saying."

One Winnipeg rabbi was so adamant about having Jews hear Thau-Eleff's message that he suggested the play be performed at his synagogue.

"One of the biggest Winnipeg synagogues came forward and the rabbi said to me, 'You're wrestling with Jewish issues and that should be done in a synagogue.' We ended up performing there which was exactly what this show needed."

Performing at a synagogue in front of a Jewish audience was a daunting task, and things didn't go so well at first.

"It was a hard crowd to win over. The venue was not at all a theatre and I could see everyone and they could see me. Toward the beginning of the show there were no laughs, tense silences and audible sighs. I slowly won them over as they learned what the show and the characters were about."

Because Thau-Eleff can win over all sorts of crowds – from conservative Jews to people young and old – his reputation has grown, which now allows him to take his show on the road for the first time. He's already gone to Montreal, and has Toronto and Minneapolis waiting in the wings. Some of his biggest shows could come in mid-August, when he hits the epicentre of theatre, the city with one of the largest Jewish communities in the world, New York.

"It's really exciting and frightening to be performing in New York. I'm scared no one will show up, but hopefully there will be a good crowd because the more people there are the more we can learn from each other."

Catch Three Ring Circus at the Toronto Fringe Festival from July 7-16 at the Tarragon Theatre Extra Space.

The Syrian Bride sheds light on the secretive Druze of the Golan Heights

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Syrian bride played by Clara Khoury

The Syrian Bride, Eran Riklis' intriguing examination of a Druze family on the Golan Heights, consists of small, converging dramas that shed light on a generally secretive society.

Set mainly in the Druze village of Majdal Shams, which Israel captured from Syria in the 1967 Six Day War, the film unfolds in Arabic, Hebrew, English, Russian and French against the backdrop of social and political tensions.

The Druze, a breakaway sect from Islam, have a history of adapting to their host societies, whether in Israel or Syria. They maintain a low profile and tend to keep their customs and religious practices under tight wraps.

In light of their reclusivity, one imagines that Riklis, the director of the acclaimed Israeli film Cup Final, must have worked extra hard to make T*he Syrian Bride*, which opens in Toronto on July 8.

The film takes place in the summer of 2000, shortly after the death of Syria's president, Hafez Assad. It opens with a panoramic view of the Golan and a close-up of a pensive woman lying in a bed. It then shifts to a television studio in Damascus, where a star announcer named Tallel (Derar Sliman) announces his forthcoming marriage. His colleagues are bemused and poke gentle fun at him.

Back in Majdal Shams, the nervous young bride, Mona (Clara Khoury), pours her heart out to her older, married sister, Amal (Hiam Abbass), a modern woman of the world whose traditional husband stifles her creative impulses.

Mona has never actually met Tallel, having only seen him on TV, and fears she will be lonely in Damascus. Once she leaves the Golan, she may not be permitted to go back to visit her family, given the state of war between Israel and Syria.

Riklis heightens the drama a notch by introducing two additional characters, Mona's brother, Hattem (Eyad Sheety), and her father, Hammed (Makram Khoury).

The Druze elders in Majdal Shams warn Hammed that they will boycott the wedding if Hattem attends. They consider Hattem an outcast because of his marriage to a Russian doctor, Evelyna (Evelyne Kaplun), whom he wed in Moscow eight years ago.

Taking their threat seriously, Hammed gives Hattem, Evelyna and their son the cold shoulder.

Riklis adds another layer of complexity to the film when Hammed – a pro-Syrian figure who opposes Israel's occupation and has been imprisoned for his political activities – participates in a noisy demonstration during which his fellow protesters shout, "The Golan belongs to Syria."

Worried that her father's politics may jeopardize his chances of accompanying Mona to the Syrian border and saying goodbye to her there, Amal speaks to a local Israeli police official and pleads for leniency.

Amal, smart and vivacious, is quite a lady. She wears jeans and refrains from covering her head in pious Muslim fashion. Yet she is repressed. Her husband, Amin (Adnan Trabshi), has long resisted her demand to study social work at university. He claims he will lose face if she becomes a student.

Further spicing up the proceedings, Riklis inserts a peripheral scene in which Amal's pretty daughter outrages some members of her community by dating the son of an Israeli "collaborator."

In an attempt at balance, Riklis lets a gruff Israeli official fudge regulations so that Mona's wedding will not be delayed.

Some of the issues raised in The Syrian Bride remain unanswered and unresolved. But on the whole, everything else clicks into place.

Billionaire businessman key supporter of Russian community

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Alex Shnaider spent the first four years of his life in St. Petersburg at at time when prospects for an ambitious and talented Russian lad were, let us say, limited.

Certainly, billionaire status, a career as a steel tycoon and community philanthropy could hardly have been predicted for him 36 years ago in the former Soviet Union.

Unlike other Russian moguls, Shnaider was already living in Canada when he made his fortune in Russia and Ukraine.

When he was four, his family emigrated to Israel, and when he was 13, they moved to Canada.

Shnaider graduated from Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto, then attended Mackenzie Collegiate and York University. Along the way, he worked in his family's Russian deli, and while still living with his parents, he began trading textiles and electronics in the Soviet Union. From those humble beginnings a commercial empire was born.

Today Shnaider is director of Midland Group, a privately held multi-billion dollar company that has global interests in steel, shipping and land development.

According to Forbes magazine, he has an estimated personal wealth of $1.4 billion (US), putting him in 488th place in the exclusive billionaire's club. In addition to his interests in steel, he is behind Russia's first Formula One race team and he has plans to develop a 68-storey condominium and hotel tower in downtown Toronto in conjunction with real estate maven Donald Trump.

Despite spending only four years in the former Soviet Union, he acknowledges that "today I feel more Russian in terms of mentality, upbringing and everything else."

Still, he has adopted many elements of Canadian life that are still somewhat foreign to Soviet-era Russians, in particular his willingness to get involved in charitable endeavours, even those of a religious nature.

In the boardroom of the Midland Group's North York office, three plaques adorn the walls.

One is local, given to Shnaider by the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC) in recognition of his contribution to the financial well-being of the 40,000-strong community.

The other two testify to his philanthropic involvements in aid of Cuban Jews. One recognizes the Alex and Simone Shnaider Camp Gan Israel in Havana, a children's camp; the other marks his and Midland's aid to the community during Passover 2003.

All three philanthropic gestures were carried out through the Chabad movement.

Though he grew up in a secular household, he feels drawn to the good works of Chabad and he is ready to open his pocketbook to help where he feels help is needed.

Colleagues at the JRCC, where Shnaider serves as president, describe him as a down-to-earth individual with a strong sense of social responsibility and the willingness to put his money where his heart is.

His largess has permitted the JRCC to undertake ambitious programs of community development they could not otherwise afford, and his example, JRCC officials hope, will attract other successful Russian businesspeople to invest in the community.

"Alex sees that not all Russian Jews are as fortunate as we are and they need help," said Igor Korenzvit, a Russian businessman who serves as chair of the JRCC.

The values that made him a highly successful entrepreneur – a belief in education, loyalty, generosity and his sharp mind – have contributed to his "skyrocketing business success… rather than luck or inheritance," Korenzvit said.

Alex Shnaider

"He's a real family man with Jewish values," he added.

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, executive-director of the JRCC, said Shnaider "interacts with others in a simple, straightforward, humble way. I see him as a quite impressive family man. I see that in the way he treats his parents and grandparents.

"He's called a billionaire, but [I see] the same guy. He didn't change."

Rabbi Zaltzman acknowledges that Shnaider is a key backer of the JRCC. "He's a major supporter today, and he didn't grow up with it. In Russia, there was nowhere to see it.

"Without him, we'd be able to do much less."

Shnaider remains the JRCC's primary contributor, and at the end of every fiscal year, he examines the books and tops up the centre's funds with cash as needed.

He has helped support the Ohr Menachem Day School as well as the JRCC's religious and cultural programming.

He and his business partner, Ed Shifrin, also sponsor Jewish weekend schools back in Russia. They have built a computer school employing the latest in Israeli technology and they fund a soup kitchen in Zaporozhye, Ukraine, where Midland retains business interests.

Shnaider and Shifrin are constructing a synagogue in Volgograd, where Midland owns a steel mill.

Altogether, Shnaider said, he allocates "a few million" dollars each year to charitable causes.

"It's hard to say no. But unfortunately, you must say no or it will never end."

One person who is grateful he didn't say no is a former Cuban employee whose four-year-old son was diagnosed with leukemia. Cuba's medical system could do little for him, so Shnaider funded the entire family's trip to Germany where the boy was treated in a modern hospital. The family has lived in Germany for more than a year and could reside there six months longer before they return to Cuba.

It was on one of his many business trips to Cuba that Shnaider saw for himself the Cubans' deplorable living conditions. The local rabbi approached him and asked for help. "I realized it was a good cause," and his association with Cuban Jewry was established.

Growing up in Russia, Shnaider was two generations removed from religious observance. He dimly recalls a trip to the synagogue on one of the High Holy Days, but even his grandparents were not particularly observant. His great-grandparents, who hailed from Bessarabia, were "more traditional."

He has fond recollections of life in Israel, growing up in the midst of an expatriate Russian community in Netanya. He had lots of friends and lots of freedom to roam around, something he said is missing for his three children in Toronto. "Here, I'm afraid to let my daughter in the backyard alone," he said.

At age 12, he attended a weekend get together at Kfar Chabad and he recalls the experience as "quite interesting. The warmth and care of the family I stayed with was really special."

Shnaider was a reluctant immigrant to Canada, and "for the first little while, I didn't like it… Over time, I got used to it.

"Here I found language barriers."

He found Canadian kids made fun of his accent. "I didn't feel very welcome," he said. "For a while, I was alienated."

Shnaider has very little contact with the established Jewish community in Toronto, but he's heavily involved with Jewish communities in Russia and Ukraine.

Successful businessmen in the former Soviet Union are beginning to take a greater interest in philanthropy and "they're giving back to the community," Shnaider said. "For me, I always understood you have to help as much as possible, to give back as much as possible."

Lauren Posner: Her self-titled debut CD has launched an unplanned musical career.

Montrealer's debut CD generating buzz and airplay

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

As she prepares for upcoming performances at the Montreal Jazz Festival and the Quebec Summer Festival on July 8 and 9 respectively, Montreal-area singer-songwriter Lauren Posner looks back at what she describes as a fortuitous series of coincidences that led to the release of her debut CD Lauren Posner three months ago and the start of an unplanned musical career.

Lauren Posner the CD presents renditions of a handful of traditional Jewish songs (including Dona Dona, Adon Olam, Hineh Ma Tov and Miserlou) in Hebrew, Yiddish and Ladino, as well as a few more songs in French and English.

Posner expresses surprise at the amount of airplay she has received so far. The CD's opening version of Sholom Aleichem recently made it onto Radio Canada's top-five playlist.

"I never even thought about doing this, it just happened," she said. "At every stage along the way, there seemed to be another player saying, 'Keep going with this, go deeper, people want to hear this.' The energy around this project seemed to be particularly in my favour."

Several years ago, Posner made a plain musical demo and played it for her French instructor, who introduced her to Igor Bartula, one of several musicians with whom she began to jam. A bassist and producer, Bartula encouraged her to do more recording and asked her to choose a few more songs.

"It was sort of obvious for me to go with these Jewish tunes that were so much a part of my upbringing. I had sung them as a kid with other kids in school and at summer camp, and they always touched me in a deep way. I wanted to give them back in a more mature manner."

The project was further propelled by a provincial bursary and the enthusiastic support of the studio where Posner and band were recording. The musicians, including a bassist, percussionist, pianist, violinist and acoustic, electric and flamenco guitarists, deliver a polished fusion of world, ethnic and pop sounds.

Posner and Bartula co-wrote Lover, a love song that reflects a combination of modern pop and Middle Eastern musical influences. She also set a poem by Yehuda Amichai to music in Come Forth and penned the French lyrics for Sentiers de L'amour.

Her sweet-voiced and meditative treatment enhances the depth of the lyrics of several traditional pieces from scripture, which she sings in the original Hebrew. Hineh Ma Tov (which musically resembles Gordon Lightfoot's Wreck of the Edmund Fitzgerald) is based on a verse from Psalm 133: "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is when brethren dwell closely together." And Lo Yisa Goi is based on the famous passage in Isaiah about beating swords into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks.

Born in Toronto in 1974, Posner attended United Synagogue Day Schools and continued her Jewish education in Rockville, Md., where her family relocated for four years. (Her father, Michael Posner, is an arts reporter for the Globe and Mail and a former correspondent for Maclean's.)

She earned an undergraduate degree in biology at McGill and has begun graduate studies in the field of human rights. Her nine-month-old son is the obvious explanation for her seemingly gradual approach to both her university studies and musical career.

"The CD's been received very well," she said. "For someone who's completely unknown as a music artist here in Quebec . . . we've got it on the shelves of many music stores and people have really responded to it, especially people who are not necessarily Jewish. There's a great love of world music here and a real appreciation for different ethnic backgrounds."

Lauren Posner, the album, was produced by Igor Bartula on the Milagro label. For further details and a musical sample, please visit the website www.laurenposner.com.

Soccer team to rely on hard work, defence

D.C, and Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa, on full athletic scholarships. He is also the head goalkeeper coach for the Ontario provincial soccer teams and was a member of the Under-20 Canadian national team that won CONCACAF in 1996.

Chencinski is the keeper for Robert Morris University, a school near Pittsburgh that's in the Northeast Conference of the NCAA.

Brahimi is comfortable with that group. Up front, he's got Torontonian Shmuel Hazan, who plays professional soccer for Maccabi Netanya in Israel's premier division, plus a bunch of guys who have emigrated to Canada and who brought some soccer skill with them, including players originally from Israel, Argentina, South Africa and Russia.

"We're going with a terrific bunch of guys who are very committed, who'll be playing their hearts out," Brahimi said. "You see it at practice. They're a very competitive bunch."

That suits the coaches fine, as Brahimi readily admits that he and Mar hate to lose.

Misha Levkov, 26, agrees that "we have a very hard working team."

But the quality of the opposition will make the tournament "a challenge" for Canada, he said.

The Canadian entry has done pretty well in exhibitions, beating Toronto Maccabi and Glen Shields Sun Devils, another CPSL squad. However, they lost in the finals of a Maccabi tournament in Montreal to an entry from Israel.

Levkov, who was born in Riga, Latvia, will suit up as a striker for Canada, though he normally plays outside midfield for the North York Astros, a team in the CPSL.

Canada's coaches will no doubt rely on Levkov's experience in their key matches. A member of the Ontario provincial team when he was 13 and 14, he moved up to the youth national team when he was 16.

Levkov earned a scholarship to Cleveland State University, studying organizational communications and marketing, and played four years of NCAA Division I ball. He was second in team scoring in his senior year and third in assists.

After moving back to Toronto, he played one season for the Metro Lions, a former CPSL team, and then moved to South Korea to play pro soccer.

"It was an amazing experience. The quality of soccer there and the professionalism is absolutely amazing."

Four years ago, he was all set to represent Canada in Israel, but the games were nearly cancelled over security concerns. In the end, Canada sent a small team that did not include a soccer squad.

Argentina won that competition and is a perennial soccer power, while Israel also figures to have a strong team, Levkov said.Their Under-21 national team beat France in a UEFA Cup qualifier earlier this year.

Levkov has no illusions about Canada's chances for a medal. "I'm going more for the experience. As a team, we're going to do our best representing Canada. As a whole, I think the experience will be just unforgettable."

Cardinals' pitcher off to good start

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

When Jason Marquis was dealt to the St. Louis Cardinals in December 2003, he was given a chance to become part of the club's five-man starting rotation. He responded last year by having the best season by a Jewish pitcher since Steve Stone won the Cy Young Award for Baltimore in 1980.

Marquis flourished on the 2004 National League Champion Cardinals, going 15-7 with a 3.71 earned run average and 138 strikeouts in 201⅓ innings over his 32 starts. He also contributed with the bat, hitting a league-high .292 among NL pitchers with 21 hits, including six doubles and nine runs batted in.

He says his success with the Redbirds is just a matter of them giving him an opportunity to go out and pitch every five days.

"I felt like I was always looking over my shoulder when I was in Atlanta, so it was nice to come over here and get a fresh start," said Marquis, who took an 8-3 record with a 3.27 ERA into his start in the series final against the Blue Jays. Things didn't go quite so well for the St. Louis starter in his game in the Rogers Centre. Marquis gave up five runs on eight hits, including a three-run outburst in the second inning with two out. The Jays chased Marquis after five innings with Ted Lilly getting the win.

Marquis was coming off a stellar performance against the New York Yankees, the team the Staten Island native loved growing up and yearned to play for. The 26-year-old said it was a dream come true to pitch against the Bronx Bombers, who he held to one run on six hits over eight innings in an 8-1 victory.

Quite a turnaround from two years ago when he appeared in only 21 games for the Braves, mostly in relief, and spent the majority of the season at Triple A-Richmond. Atlanta's first-round supplemental draft pick in 1996 was a career 14-15 before the trade and in three years had an ERA over five.

"Atlanta was so rich in pitching that they couldn't give him the ball," said St. Louis manager Tony LaRussa. "We needed a starter and [pitching coach] Dave Duncan has been really good for him. Every time he goes out there he has a better feel."

Marquis played a key role in helping the Cardinals run away with the NL Central en route to a 105-win season last year and a spot in the World Series, in which they were swept by the Red Sox.

He put together an 11-game winning streak stretching from late May into September, the longest by a St. Louis starter since John Tudor recorded the feat in 1985. Over 17 starts in that period, he allowed only 37 earned runs in 111⅓ innings.

Marquis struggled down the stretch and was 0-1 with a 5.65 ERA in four post-season appearances, three of which were starts. He walked 13 in 14⅓ innings, while allowing 15 hits, 10 of which went for extra bases.

He tossed a scoreless inning in relief in game two of the World Series, but got into the opener when he was inserted as a pinch-runner and scored a run. Marquis started game four and pitched well in a 3-0 loss.

A two-seam sinking fastball he added to his repertoire under the tutelage of Duncan seems to have made all the difference. He throws the sinker in the low to mid-90s, along with a four-seam fastball and a cutter.

Marquis, 8-5 so far this year, also mixes in a decent curveball and change-up.

His hitting continues to be a big part of his game, although with the designated hitter rule in effect, he wouldn't get to swing the bat in Toronto.

"It's something I always pride myself on," said Marquis, who was batting .368, with three doubles, a triple, a homer and seven RBIs this season. "I was always taught, whatever you do, try to be the best at it."

Families play together at Maccabiah Games

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

They say the family that plays together stays together, and in the case of the Dinetz clan, sports is bringing the family of four to Israel to compete in the Maccabiah Games.

Howard Dinetz will enjoy his third Games experience, but for the others, it will be their first Maccabiah. The family patriarch has won a gold medal in 10-pin bowling at a previous Games and he no doubt hopes the experience rubs off on his kids. Jason, 21, will be one of only two pitchers leading the men's softball team, while daughter Jaclyn, 18, is a versatile member of the women's softball squad. Mom Cathy manages the women's softball team.

They're not the only families heading to Israel. Canada's 390-strong team boasts a number of father-son and brother-brother combinations. In golf, there are the twin pairings of father Michael Albert and son David as well as Steven Goldenberg and son, Jay. In volleyball, the Binstock brothers, Josh and Aaron, will line up next to the Shermer boys, Eli and Daniel. Their dad, George, will be back in Toronto wishing them well, but he, too, is a key member of the team, having scouted and recruited players.

Jaclyn Dinetz swings for the fences.

In water polo, Ariel Lantos will be swimming for Canada and his dad, movie producer Robert Lantos, a former Maccabiah athlete himself, is funding the team.

But back to the Binstocks. The family connections don't end with the brothers. Martin Binstock, their uncle, writes that his nephew, Richard Kurtz, won a bronze medal in basketball back in 1977; his niece, Heather Matile (originally a Kurtz) is competing in women's basketball this year, and her husband, John, won two golds in wrestling in 1997. The Maccabiah connection goes on: Binstock's other nephew, Alan Kurtz, will compete in men's masters basketball, making for six Maccabians from one family.

As for the Dinetz crew, Jason has been told by his dad to expect "an incredible experience" at the Games.

On the field, it's shaping up as one long grind for Jason and the team's other pitcher, Joshua McKinlay.

He's expecting the team will play 13 games in 10 days, meaning he'll pitch every other day.

Can his arm stand the strain? Jason's not too worried. "It's good for me. I'm more of a junk ball pitcher."

Softball pitching, he explained, is not as hard on the arm as throwing a hardball. Power is generated in the legs and butt. "That's why we can go longer, and [you] can move the ball without killing yourself."

Jason's first Maccabi experience was two years ago in Santiago, Chile, at the Pan Am Maccabi Games." I was very nervous, but I ended up proving myself," he said.

Back in Toronto, Jason plays for two teams, the Davisville Dodgers and Vaughan Selects.

As Cathy explains, the rest of the family plays softball too. Jaclyn, who can pitch, catch or play pretty well anywhere in the field, suits up for Port Perry Angels as a right fielder and catcher. She's played in two JCC Maccabi Youth Games in Philadelphia and Montreal, finishing as high as fourth.

Though he's going as a bowler, Howard's also a softball player and he coaches the Markham Cougars rep team, Cathy said.

Cathy, who works for Maccabi Canada, used to play volleyball and softball. The idea that sports is bringing the family to Israel "is really exciting," she said. "As a family we're all going together hoping to win gold medals in each of our sports. To spend time together [in Israel] is a special thing."

Maccabi volleyball coach predicts medal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Naturally, most athletes who compete in major events say they intend to win, or at least come away with a medal. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to beat anybody without that kind of confidence in your own abilities.

When Dov Milman says Canada's men's team will advance to the final of the upcoming Maccabiah Games volleyball tournament, it sounds almost like a guarantee.

Milman is coaching this year's volleyball entry at the games, and he touts it as "an excellent team.

Dov Milman

"If God will be with me and [we experience] no injuries, then I expect to be in the final," he said.

Confidence or hubris? With the games less than a week away, we'll know pretty soon. But Milman has been there before, seen just about all there is to see in international volleyball and has experience coaching in the Maccabiah Games.

A native of Kibbutz Merhavia, Milman has been coaching high-level volleyball for going on 30 years.

In the early 1970s, he was an assistant coach with the Israeli national team and competed in the Maccabiah Games. In the early '80s, he was chosen to coach the country's national team, which he led to appearances in the European Spring Cup and European championships.

After moving to Canada, he coached one of Ontario's consistently better teams, the Scarborough Solars, taking them to the Canadian championship. For the past few years, he's been out of coaching, devoting his energies to building up his plastic pipes business.

Maccabi Canada's volleyball team gets ready for a practice.

He was recruited to coach the Canadians and has worked closely with George Shermer, a former Maccabiah player and coach, in getting the team ready.

Shermer believes that Milman brings to the job not just a vast reservoir of coaching knowledge and skill, but a unique awareness of the opposition – at least that coming from Israel. And thanks to his connections there, he has arranged three pre-Maccabiah exhibitions that will fine-tune the team and test some of the strategies he has devised for the competition.

The pre-tournament games are important because the team was assembled less than two months ago when its funding was finalized, and it has yet to face top opposition.

Had he had more time, Milman said, he could have found another couple of good players to round out the squad. As it is, they'll be travelling to Israel with only 10 players, two shy of the 12 allowed.

Still, Milman likes what he sees. "I believe we have an excellent attack and a very good defence," he said.

What's more, there's a good blend of youth and veteran savvy. Three guys are over 30 and the rest are in their 20s. One key member of the team, Aaron Binstock, is only 16½, but he'll be relied on for his spiking ability, Milman said.

Milman has devised a strategy appropriate to the style of play usually found at the Maccabiah, one in which "we are going to open the net, not close the net."

Josh Binstock, Aaron's older brother and one of the best players in Canada in his age group, is expected to draw two defenders when he moves to the net, leaving the rest of the players one-on-one with a better ability to get by opponents' blockers, he said.

In addition, "We are going to run spike serves and try to get ace points," Milman said.

Eli Shermer, who played on the provincial champion team from Loyalist College in Belleville, will be in a spike position on the right side of the net, while team captain Howie Grossinger, a veteran who once captained the University of Toronto's team, will be the main playmaker.

> 'Closing the loop coming back to Israel'

"I put on his shoulders [the job] of carrying the team to the final," Milman said. "He knows it and he knows why we're going to do it."

Other members of the team include Daniel Shermer, Eli's brother and also George's son, who was a league all-star with Loyalist College; Kevin Halmos, a former captain of W.L. Mackenzie high school's team; Tom Tytel, a gold medallist with the men's basketball team in 1997; Josh Greenberg, who's played in regional and national club championships; Steve Willis, a libero (a player in the back court who is a defensive specialist) at Queen's University; and Phil Scher, a member of North York championship teams.

For some, the competition will mark their debut at the Maccabiah Games. For others, like Milman, it will mark a return.

He said that for him, "it is closing the loop coming back to Israel, with Canada on my shirt. As a proud Canadian Jew, I can tell you it's not so simple, especially if I get a chance to play against Israel. It will be something special."

Martinis, shopping and pyjamas

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

A woman I know recently told me that as we get older, our girlfriends become more like sisters to us than friends. I have known most of my close girlfriends for more than half my life and we share a strong bond, so I couldn't agree more.

Last month, a group of us left our significant others behind and had a girls-only weekend getaway at the cottage. Sometime between drinking martinis, sharing secrets until the wee hours of the morning, making brunch in our pyjamas and laughing about old memories, I realized how lucky I am to have such great friends. Years ago, as girls, we accepted each other's little quirks and have now grown to love the things that make us unique women.

Many of these friendships evolved over the years because we have been through so much together. We shared stories of our first kisses and our worst blind dates. We offered each other shoulders to cry on during those horrible breakups, when we thought the world would end and we gave each other poetry about strong, independent women who survived. We held each other's hair back when we got sick in high school and promised never to drink alcohol again. We borrowed each other's clothes, skipped school and literally shopped till we dropped.

We have shared simchahs such as graduations, birthdays, our first job, engagements, weddings and the birth of babies. We have travelled together and stayed in the most luxurious hotels and the cheapest motels – and had an equally good time in both.

One of my friends now lives far away from me, in the suburbs of Thornhill with her husband and two young children. For more than a decade, we spoke almost daily, even when I lived in another country. Unfortunately, these days we don't see each other or speak as often as we used to. But the beauty of our friendship is that when we do get together, it's like no time has passed between visits and we can still talk about anything.

I met another girlfriend in junior high school, and we used to speak up to five times a day. We would confirm what we were wearing to school, what we were going to watch on television each night and what boy was the cutest in class. At our weekly slumber parties as teenagers, we made ourselves sick eating chocolate chip cookie dough ice cream and daydreamed about marrying Johnny Depp.

Another friend taught me how to give a good, strong bear-like hug – we actually practised. She made me dinner when I had no money, and also when I did. She has always been the first person to support my ever-changing career choices and has helped me with so much without ever expecting anything in return.

My friendships have progressed from signing yearbooks on the last day of school to signing guest books at weddings.

Our conversations have changed, as well. A friend recently gave me the lowdown, in explicit detail, on the positives and negatives of breastfeeding – the things that doctors just don't tell you.

When we go for brunch, we sometimes have Sex and the City-style conversations about love, relationships and life. Nothing is off limits, and we never judge each other. We sometimes laugh so hard that tears roll down our faces.

Over the years, I've learned that regardless of how busy you are in life, it's imperative to make time for friends. A good long talk with a girlfriend can cure many things and make you feel less alone in the world.

I have also learned that a true friend stands by your side no matter what, and can tell you things you don't want to tell yourself.

But most importantly, I've learned you're never too old for slumber parties.

There's more to education than school

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

These summer months give both educators and parents an opportunity to reflect on the larger issues in Jewish schooling, and taking a break from daily pressures can help us gain perspective.

In my capacity as director of Toronto's Board of Jewish Education, I get the usual complaints from both parents and professional educators (and occasionally from exceptionally bright children). Parents sometimes complain about school policies and the obvious limits of institutional education. Principals have issues with families that make demands beyond the capabilities of a school. In most cases, there is some degree of error on both sides of any given dispute, but in almost all cases, expectations on both sides are beyond what schooling can offer.

Schooling is not synonymous with education. It's only fairly recently that we have entrusted schools with the life-critical mitzvah of teaching our children. Even when parents hired tutors in an earlier age, it was understood that the home and the family had a major role in the inter-generational transmission of values and customs. Bringing children into this world – another important mitzvah – is all about nature, but guiding them and introducing them to God's world in all its infinite mystery and wonder is all about nurture.

Both families and educators need to be reminded, on a regular basis, that education goes beyond the walls of our schools. While I'm convinced that schools can do more than merely instruct, and that they do have a role in moral education (especially Jewish schools), it is true that too much is expected of the school in this very important arena. The family dinner table is a much more effective lab for teaching the ethical path than any classroom, and parents must re-assume their responsibilities in that domain.

This is a greater demand than asking parents to help with math homework. It's about an obligation to nurture in the home those very values that ensure our continuing existence as a people who care to repair a broken world.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Toronto Jewish loneliness

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I've written on this topic before, but I am frequently reminded of it, and bothered by it, and therefore have decided to put it out there again.

The Toronto Jewish community is many things. We are known worldwide for our affluence and generosity. The continual increase in the population of our community is virtually unparalleled outside of Israel.

But ask a dozen newcomers to Toronto how it is to be absorbed into our community to become a real member of it. More often than not you will hear it is lonely. Basically, the Toronto Jewish community does not have a reputation of exuding warmth and being inviting.

I have come to this conclusion after many discussions over the years with people who have settled here. A while back, I asked a South African Jew what it was like to be part of the Toronto Jewish community. He said, "It's very hard to make friends and to feel accepted. And I have been here for a few years."

I challenged him, replying, "But you're a shul goer. Certainly you must benefit from the Jewish hospitality we pride ourselves on, the belief that wherever you go in the world, you have a home as long as another Jew is there?"

He said he has rarely received an invitation to someone's home following Shabbat services in his synagogue, or an extended hand of friendship.

Recently, I asked an Israeli who arrived here last year a similar question: "How do you feel living in a place mostly free of external worries, with a thriving Jewish community?"

Her response was, "I love the peace Toronto offers my family, but we have had a hard time finding the soul."

"What do you mean by that?" I queried. "After all, there are over one hundred places to pray, dozens of kosher restaurants and lectures, events and programs galore.

"That's not what I mean," the native-Israeli answered me. "I don't understand your mentality here. In Israel, we don't have to make reservations weeks in advance to visit our neighbours. In fact, we know our neighbours. In Israel, people yell and shout, but they were open and they show you their soul. Here it's not like that."

Loneliness. Lack of soul.

So what is the hole in our Jewishness that elicits such disturbing responses from Jews who came here expecting to find "community"? Why does it seem that the effervescent personalities of the South American and the Israeli are forced to squelch themselves in order to fit into an attitude, a way, which they say is reserved, private, concealed and hush-hush?

Of course, warmth can be found in our neighbourhoods; in shtieblach (small shuls), and places with outreach programs. Clearly there are amiable folks in every cranny of the community – individuals who can spot and respond to the stranger who enters their domains with that "new kid in the class" look.

However, as a collective we would do well to consider upgrading our hospitality skills.

This could be achieved by implementing a cross-town way of thinking; maybe a program titled Operation Abraham, whose mission statement would be to encourage the strength of the Patriarch Abraham, known for hachnasat orchim – embracing the guest or newcomer. The program's success could be predicated in part by incorporating the effusive character traits of our newer community members – the joy of the South African, the "living in the moment" trait of our Israelis, and the outgoing "walk in the park" spirit of our Russian community members.

Let every shul, synagogue, temple, organization and individual in the Toronto Jewish community pledge to make this city as warm and soulful as the sun shining down on Jerusalem on a balmy summer day. Operation Abraham! Remember how difficult it was to be new.

'A sense of shocked disbelief'

By JENNIFER FRAZER
Special to The CJN

LONDON — I'm writing more than 72 hours after the bombs hit London, and there is still a sense of shocked disbelief among my friends and colleagues about the day the ordinary became the extraordinary.

Tavistock Square, where the No. 30 bus had its roof blown off when the bomb exploded on its top deck, is a typical central London thoroughfare. It boasts a grand, 19th-century building that belongs to the British Medical Association and, coincidentally, was the site of the explosion. The building is frequently used by film companies that want to have its facade double for a stately home or an embassy. I've even seen it decked out in Canadian flags. There's a pretty, fenced-off garden opposite. The area is on the fringes of Bloomsbury and is prime tourist country, with several hotels along the street.

It was also, until relatively recently, the home of many Jewish organizations. Student headquarters, Hillel House, is just around the corner; the chief rabbi's office and the Board of Deputies were close by. The chief rabbi's office has moved out to the suburbs, but the board is now in Bloomsbury Square, only yards from both the bus bomb and Russell Square, the tube station where one of the underground bombs exploded.

And it's my daily route to work. I drive in every day from my home in north-west London, and on this particular day, I was a little later than usual, getting to the Tavistock Square area around 10 a.m. I saw hundreds of people walking around

As leaders of the eight industrialized nations addressed African poverty at the G-8 conference in Scotland last week, two Canadians were building a school library in a west African village.

Jessica Gilbert of Thornhill and Leanne Rosen of Vancouver are participating in the American Jewish World Service (AJWS) summer volunteer program in Ghana. AJWS is a non-profit organization that provides opportunities for Jews to become involved in development work.

In a recent telephone interview, the two students described their experience abroad, and how they are fulfilling tikkun olam, the Jewish concept of helping to repair the world. "Our goal is to make a positive contribution to the community, but one that is sustainable. The benefits of our work are not going to end as soon as we leave," said Gilbert, 20, who will be returning to McMaster University in Hamilton in the fall.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Anti-Semitic Acts Rise

EDMONTON — Despite a drop in reported hate crimes in Edmonton, anti-Semitic acts were higher in 2004 than in 2003, police said last week. There were 29 hate-related events targeting Jews, 15 of them criminal, in 2004, up from 11 acts, 10 criminal, the Edmonton Sun reported. Police said it's too early to identify a trend, as the force's hate crimes unit has only tracked figures for two years. But police also said the rise may be linked to the Mideast, as well as more training for beat officers as to what constitutes a hate crime. A spokesperson for the Jewish community said Jews may also be more likely to report incidents, even small ones.

WORLD

Join a Shul, Get Perks

LONDON — Britain's main Orthodox synagogue body is offering freebies to get young Jews to join synagogues. The initiative by Tribe, the youth wing of the United Synagogue, lets singles ages 21 to 30 join their chosen shul as full members, including burial rights, for a nominal fee. They also get incentives such as free phone calls and discounts on health insurance, travel, health and beauty services, as well as kosher wine and food.

Terror Takes a Holiday

DUBLIN — A Palestinian terrorist granted safe haven in Ireland after the 2002 Church of the Nativity siege left the country for several weeks without the knowledge of Irish police who were supposed to be monitoring him. Jihad Jara, one of two Palestinians deported to Ireland by Israel under a UN-brokered deal to end the siege, took an unauthorized trip to Spain in 2004, the Sunday Independent reported. Spanish authorities picked him up within a month of his arrival and returned him to Ireland. The report said U.S. officials are "furious" with Ireland over the matter.

Jewish Official Killed

PARIS — The vice-president of the Association of Liberal Jews of Toulouse was found murdered in his home on July 1. A freelance journalist and community activist, Rene Itzhak Autard, 60, was found, according to the police, "in a pool of blood, covered with pillows," his face and head beaten with a blunt object. Police said they're not ruling out any motive, including anti-Semitism, for the murder. Autard was an active member in the Mouvement des Juifs Liberaux, the French Reform movement of Judaism.

Pope to Daven?

ROME — The Pope will say prayers in Hebrew when he visits a German synagogue in Cologne next month. It represents Benedict XVI's latest effort to reach out to Jews since becoming pope in April. In a related development, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon invited Benedict to visit Israel. The invitation was offered as Israeli officials presented Benedict with an Israeli stamp depicting Pope John Paul II's visit to the Western Wall in Jerusalem in 2000. Benedict has not yet accepted or rejected the offer.

Deportation Ordered

PHILADELPHIA — A U.S. federal immigration court in has ordered the deportation of a former Nazi concentration camp guard to either Ukraine, Poland or Germany. The court found Theodor Szehinskyj, 79, currently a resident of West Chester, Penn., had served in the SS Death's Head guard unit at Gross-Rosen, Sachsenhausen and Warsaw concentration camps from January 1943 to February 1945. Szehinskyj is a native of Malnow, a town in prewar Poland that is currently within the borders of Ukraine.

Islamist Goes On Trial

LONDON — The trial of a British Islamic leader charged with advocating the murder of Jews and others opened last week. Abu Hamza Al-Masri has pleaded innocent to the charges, pre-empting a U.S. bid to extradite him. Al-Masri is the former head of London's Finsbury Park Mosque, which has been linked to terror suspects. U.S. authorities want him for allegedly trying to start a terror training camp in Oregon, involvement with hostage taking in Yemen, and funding terror training in Afghanistan.

Church Votes to Begin Divestment Process

ATLANTA — The U.S.-based United Church of Christ called on members to employ "economic leverage" against Israel, including possible divestment.

A resolution passed at the UCC's biennial synod in Atlanta last week urged local churches "to use economic leverage," including "divesting from those companies that refuse to change their practices of gain from the perpetuation of violence, including the occupation." A separate resolution called on Israel to remove its West Bank security barrier.

The resolutions drew a sharp reaction from Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, who described them as "functionally anti-Semitic."

Cooper said the resolutions are the efforts of a small group of activists and not rank-and-file church members.

Ahenakew plays victim, lashes out at Jewish groups

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Former native leader David Ahenakew assumed the role of victim and lashed out at Jewish organizations after a judge fined him $1,000 for promoting hatred against Jews.

Speaking at a news conference after provincial court judge Marty Irwin pronounced sentence on July 8, Ahenakew said native Canadians had been victims of cultural genocide and worse oppression than Jews under the Nazis. He said Indians don't receive justice in Canadian courts.

"I hope my trial has revealed some of the frustration and pain of my people," said Ahenakew, the former chief of the Assembly of First Nations (AFN). "If an Indian slips a little bit, [he is] crucified."

Ahenakew was convicted of promoting hatred against Jews as a result of statements he made to a reporter following a public address at a conference of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations in December 2002. He told the assembly that Jews had started World War II and he later told the reporter that Jews "damn near owned all of Germany" before the war. "That's why [Hitler] fried six million of those guys. How do you get rid of a disease like that, that's going to take over everything?"

In pronouncing sentence, Irwin said Ahenakew's comments "dehumanize the Jewish people. To suggest that any human being or group of human beings is a disease is to invite extremists to take action against them."

Striking a defiant tone at his news conference on Friday, Ahenakew said he would appeal the verdict.

Ahenakew said "hatred of First Nations people is rampant in our country and it exists in the legal and justice systems, the media and the Canadian economy."

He blamed Canadian Jewish Congress for allegedly orchestrating a lobbying campaign to strip him of his Order of Canada honours. The governor-general's advisory council announced last week it has begun the process of stripping Ahenakew of the honour.

Ahenakew, 71, said, "This… was the direct result of the pressure put on the advisory committee by some of the Jewish

Vandal given house arrest, probation for anti-Semitic spree

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The last of three young vandals who toppled headstones in a Jewish cemetery as part of an anti-Semitic rampage was sentenced last week.

Steven Vandermey, 19, was sentenced to six months house arrest, two years probation and ordered to pay $3,000 in restitution. He was convicted of five counts of simple mischief.

On March 19, 2004, Vandermey and two young offenders overturned 25 headstones at Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park, threw stones through the windows of the Pride of Israel Synagogue, defaced Jewish signs with swastikas and smashed windows at Eitz Chaim Day School. The incident followed shortly after another anti-Semitic rampage in Markham, in which homes were defaced with swastikas.

Vandermey's sentence – and those of the youths – disappointed Jewish organizations that monitor anti-Semitism. However, a rabbi who has met with Vandermey and discussed the incident with him believes the sentence is appropriate.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada said the sentence would fail to deter others contemplating a hate crime.

Accepting responsibility

From the editor's desk

Fostering positive inter-ethnic relations and multicultural tolerance has been deemed so vital an aspect of the Canadian way of life that in 1982, the "founding political fathers" of the day decided to enshrine that collective, national goal into the over-arching, legal and societal framework of our constitution.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Section 27, says, "Shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians."

Indeed, so high a value have we placed on achieving and maintaining societal harmony, that in certain instances we attach greater importance to this aim than in ensuring an unfettered right to freedom of speech.

It was this trade-off – reducing the individual right to freedom of speech for the sake, theoretically at least, of trying to ensure intra-communal tolerance and of protecting minority rights – that was the legal underpinning for the charges that lead to the conviction last month of David Ahenakew on a charge of wilfully promoting hatred against an identifiable group.

In sentencing Ahenakew to a fine of $1,000, Saskatchewan Provincial Court Judge Marty Irwin said that the defendant's statement that the Jews were a disease "clearly dehumanized the Jewish people" and amounted to an invitation to extremists "to take action against them."

Ahenakew did not respond well to the judgment or to the fine. Though he may have felt chastened, he certainly showed no evidence of it. Nor did he show remorse, or regret, or sorrow for his behaviour. Rather, he actually seemed oblivious to the significance of the proceedings.

He cast blame for the outcome everywhere but upon himself. He pointed an angry, accusing finger in every direction but in the one that counted most – toward his own heart.

"I have learned that native people will never get good, solid justice in this country. My case was as much about racism against First Nations as it was about alleged racism against the Jewish people," he said.

No it was not.

Ahenakew's rant was completely untrue. The proceedings against him had nothing at all to do with his being a member of the First Nations.

Had any Canadian uttered the vile and hateful remarks Ahenakew did, in the same public circumstances, he or she too would have been subject to prosecution under the law.

It was his position of leadership – not his position of First Nations member – that attracted the attention of the press and then, ultimately, the crown attorney.

And it is as a leader that Ahenakew failed most egregiously. That he still did not grasp the deep nature of the offence he gave, showed perhaps a shallowness of mind. But his tirade against the judicial system showed beyond a doubt a refusal to accept responsibility for his actions, the very opposite of the quality that we esteem among leaders and that we hold to be the essence of exemplary moral behaviour.

Ahenakew's avoidance of responsibility, however, was a contemptible message to our youth.

And he compounded the contempt by unsubtley accusing the Jews of being behind the revocation of his Order of Canada distinction. "The decision by the advisory council is a clear indication of where the power in this country lies," he said.

Again, Ahenakew demonstrated an abject failure to comprehend the profoundly offensive nature of his behaviour. And again, he demonstrated a wilful refusal to bear the responsibility for the consequences of that behaviour.

In this latter regard, Ahenakew's accusations against the Jews sounded a dark, disquieting echo of the foul incontinent theories of Quebec lawyer Guy Bertrand.

Bertrand had argued that his client, Rwandan exile Leon Mugasera, who was accused of inciting hatred and genocide of the Tutsi minority in Rwanda, would not be able to get a fair hearing from the Supreme Court of Canada because the court was biased due to the appointment to the court by Justice Minister Irwin Cotler of Rosalie Abella, the wife of the former president of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

The appointment of Abella, Bertrand said, "can only lead a well-informed observer to conclude that unfortunately when you are powerful, rich and influential like the [CJC], for example, you can infiltrate the court through political and judicial lobbying."

The Supreme Court severely upbraided Bertrand for what it called his "unprofessional and unacceptable" behaviour. The court found that Bertrand had filed material that included "anti-Semitic sentiment and views that most might have thought had disappeared from Canadian society and even more so from legal debate in Canada."

It is a tribute to the soaring aspiration in this country to safeguard our multicultural fabric and to protect minority rights that the Governor General and the Supreme Court of Canada acted so decisively and so unambiguously against these two men who attempted to single out the Jews for hatred and suspicion. — MBD

Festival to showcase various Jewish cultures

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Plans are underway for a two-day community-wide Jewish Mosaic festival celebrating the various Jewish cultures in Toronto.

The idea for the festival – organized by the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) – came about when representatives from the BJCC and Bernard Betel decided to create a joint program for seniors living in the north end of the city.

"We thought about celebrating both Jewish diversities and Jewish similarities," said Louise Goldhar, Bernard Betel assistant executive director.

After contacting JIAS, which had contacts for members of various cultural groups, the idea "mushroomed," Goldhar said, and the festival, set for June 11 and 12, 2006, grew to include community members of all ages.

At an information meeting, held last spring, "we were knocked over by the overwhelming positive response people had to the idea," said Janet Klein-Slavin, supervisor of the BJCC's fifty-five plus department.

To date, more than 20 countries will be represented, including Turkey, Iraq, Mexico, Scandinavia, Tunisia, China, India, and various Caribbean islands. "It has been a real eye-opener for us to see how many countries are represented here.

"This is an opportunity for people to showcase their culture – 'This is how we dance the horah, this is what we eat at Rosh Hashanah, this is what a boy wears for his bar mitzvah,'" Klein-Slavin said.

People also want to share their artifacts, clothing and photos, she said. "These items may be either unique to Jews from their respective country or may in fact, emphasize similarities."

In order to maintain strict kashrut, one kosher caterer will provide samples of food representing the various countries, she said.

The idea is for participants from each county to put together what they want to present to the community at large, Klein Slavin said. "Our involvement is to guide them. They need to plan their presentation. It is going to take the entire year for it to develop into a spectacular event."

Plans are for two-day festival to start at the BJCC on June 11, 2006, and continue at Bernard Betel the next day.

At the BJCC, there will be vendors, exhibitors, children's activities, dance, music, entertainment and kosher food.

At Bernard Betel, the plan is to have lectures, panel discussions, a small number of vendors and exhibitors, a kosher dinner and evening entertainment.

Another meeting aimed at those who want to participate in the festival as a representative of their country is being held on July 21. Those who plan to attend should call 416-225-2112, ext. 2, and leave a message.

Reena leader receives government appointment

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The appointment of Sandy Keshen, Reena president and CEO, to the board of Ontario's Local Health Integration Networks (LHINs), means the organization is being recognized for its impact on the community, says Charles Beer, a former minister of community and social services.

The networks, recently created by the McGuinty government – there are 14 across the province – are responsible for planning, integrating and funding local health services to make it easier for patients to access care they need.

"This means that Sandy will be involved in the broad range of health services in the area. Her voice will be there to speak on behalf of the agency," Beer said at Reena's annual general meeting earlier this month.

Beer, now principal of Counsel Public Affairs Inc., said these bodies will become critical players in the delivery of health services.

Among the issues that need to be dealt with, he said, is the role that families play in the care of other family members.

"How can parents have a real say in what is happening to their child? The government has heard that families want a greater say in the development of programs for their children. What about aging parents? What is available in the community to help them?

"These are the questions that are starting to be asked. These are the issues that are on the table."

Sandy Keshen

Equitable funding is another critical issue that needs to be addressed, Beer said.

"We need a fair, equitable system, to which all families have access to services no matter where they live."

The government wants to develop a system that will give greater say to parents, he said. "Without agencies such as Reena, many families would not know where to turn. It is important that its voice is expressed."

The government's message, he said, is that "yes, it is going through a change and it can be unsettling, but at the end of the day, the province will be able to ensure that Reena will continue to meet the needs of the community.

"Reena will emerge stronger and more important in terms of how it assists families."

Also at the meeting, Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and founding president of Reena, announced that the organization has acquired a new home in North York.

Donated by members of the Shore family, who were instrumental in establishing the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, the home will be used by up to 24 families a year for short-term respite care.

Activist urges CZF to hold elections

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Benjamin Rubin wants to improve the relationship between Israel and the Diaspora, and he believes the way to do that is to introduce new leadership, ideas and energy into the "invisible, rudderless" Canadian Zionist Federation.

The CZF, an umbrella organization that represents Canada at the annual World Zionist Congress, has failed to carry out its mandate largely because it has not held elections for a generation, said Rubin, a Toronto-area lawyer.

The current CZF leadership, headed by president Norman Stern, is out of date and is failing to address the changing needs of the Diaspora community, Rubin said.

"They have done good things, but their experience of Israel is different for generational reasons. They have a very different mindset," said Rubin, 47, who lived in Israel for a few years and is now pressing for an election so that he can run for president of the organization.

However, Rubin can't run unless he is a member of one of CZF's 14 constituent organizations such as Herut-Likud Canada, the Reform movement-affiliated Arza Canada and Conservative-affiliated Mercaz Canada.

Rubin and his supporters are close to creating a group with 300 members – called the Zionist Leadership Initiative – the minimum number needed to join CZF as a constituent group.

He hopes that once part of CZF, the group will be able to force the federation to hold a proper election, in which the several thousand individual members of CZF's constituent organizations would be eligible to vote, rather than have its officials appointed by the heads of the constituent groups.

Rubin said that after being invited to a young Jewish leadership conference in Florida in 2000, he came to feel the CZF was not properly representing his generation.

"I am rooted in the Jewish community here. I went to Associated Hebrew Schools, I went to Brandeis University, I lived in Israel, I speak Hebrew, my kid is a [Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto] graduate, and another is going to Camp Ramah this summer… but I'm not officially represented by CZF," he said.

Stern, a 70-year-old pharmacist who became CZF president last month after Kurt Rothschild stepped down for personal reasons, said he's puzzled by Rubin's stance, since he has declined many requests to become involved with the group.

Stern agreed that the CZF needs young blood and said it's his goal to attract younger people.

He said he is already in the process of making contacts with young, Zionist Jews who are eager to begin working with the organization.

But Rubin said an election is the only way to encourage young people to join and discuss new ideas.

"Without elections, there's no debate. Without debate, there are no competing visions. I'm not looking to be obnoxious and start a fight. I just want to start a debate," he said.

Stern cited many reasons as to why CZF is unlikely to hold an election in the near future, including cost and the fact that voter turnout would probably be low because members don't know much about the umbrella organization.

He added that it's too late in the year to start an election campaign.

"Realistically, nothing can happen until September. Then it's yom tov and the holidays, then people start going off to vacation in Florida," he said with a laugh. "I'm not making excuses, but it's reality."

Stern added that the CZF's parent body, the World Zionist Organization (WZO), holds elections every year, and having a local vote on top of that would be too confusing and expensive.

"The constituents decided unanimously that it would be a mistake to call for a local election as well as a WZO election," Stern said. "The bottom line is that it makes no sense to hold two elections at the same time."

Another reason Stern would like to postpone holding CZF elections is that he wants to honour Rothschild, the group's former president, and planning that will take time and effort.

"If we are going to [honour Rothschild], we want to do it right. If we have to postpone [an election], then so be it," he said.

But he said the main reason Rubin has not received a positive response to his plan is that he and his organization are not yet part of the CZF.

"I would have a problem with someone who hasn't been involved and wants to run for president. I have asked him many times to work with us, but he has declined.

"It's like having him come to the Canadian Jewish News and say, 'I want to be hired as the managing editor,' but he's never read the paper," Stern said, just days after returning from this year's annual World Zionist Congress in Jerusalem, which, among other initiatives, developed an aliyah program.

Rubin said the CZF's current leadership is afraid that if they called an election and no one took part, it would reveal the weakness of the organization and lead to internal conflict.

He said that with advances in technology, voting can be done over the phone or online, methods that are far less expensive than traditional balloting.

As for causing conflict, Rubin said competing views are just what the organization needs, adding that an election would be an opportunity to educate the community about the CZF.

Toronto student wins Zionist essay contest

By LARA GREENBERG

He's been a finalist for the last two years and now, as he finished his last year of high school, David Tzvi Epstein won the 14th annual essay contest sponsored by the New York-based Morris and Betty J. Kaplun Foundation.

The aim of the competition is to get students thinking about Jewish and Zionist concepts. It has two levels, one for students in grades 7 to 9 and another for students from grade 10 to 12.

This year, the younger students were asked to consider "How Jewish values help make me a better person" while the question that Epstein answered was "Why does Israel matter to a Disapora Jew?"

There were 700 participants in all in the two categories.

"After working on it for so long, it's nice to be leaving school after eventually winning the competition," said Epstein, who graduated from Yeshivat Or Chaim last month.

David Tzvi Epstein

He is currently on a one-month program in Israel for the Weizmann Institute along with other students from all over the world. These students will be grouped with professors to review different institute projects.

He then plans to spend a year in Israel at Yeshivat Maale Gilboa.

First-place winners in each level received an $1,800 (US) prize.

The real critical issue

The people who were slaughtered in London last week by craven terrorists were so hideously torched that their bodies were unidentifiable days after the bombings. Our hearts cry out in sorrow for the individuals who were killed and to their families and friends.

A group calling itself the the Secret Organization of Al Qaeda in Europe claimed credit for the bombings, although no one has confirmed the group's existence, let alone its responsibility for the attacks. Experts are agreed, however, that the barbaric Thursday morning assault on the commuters of London did appear to be the work of Al Qaeda.

British law enforcement and security agencies – and their allies – have now swung into full fighting form in an effort to apprehend the people responsible for the atrocities. Their task, of course, is the task of the entire peace-loving world. And we pray for their success.

In the two-pronged campaign to capture the planners and perpetrators of the murders and to prevent such further acts in the future, it is important that we recall the first principles surrounding the war against terrorism. It is especially vital in light of remarks by British Prime Minister Tony Blair last week that may have implied that the terrorism was linked to the unresolved Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

"This type of terrorism has very deep roots," Blair said, "and as well as dealing with the terrible consequences of terrorism and trying to protect ourselves as much as any civilized society can, it's only when you start to pull it up by the roots that you'll deal with it.

"[We need to] create the circumstances in which there is a proper understanding between people of different faiths, in which some of the critical issues in the Middle East are dealt with and sorted out."

If by "critical issues in the Middle East," Blair is suggesting the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, he is completely wrong. The Islamist terrorists who were behind the London bombings are uninterested in the Palestinians and the Israelis signing an agreement to end their conflict. A peace treaty between the Palestinians and the Israelis will not calm the terrorists' roiling, revolutionary hearts. Their interest is not a treaty between two states, but rather the replacement of the Jewish state by a Muslim one.

If by "critical issues in the Middle East," Blair is suggesting the nearly total lack of freedom, lack of literacy, lack of political rights and lack of economic well-being and opportunity in the Arab world, he is correct, but only partially.

The terrorists attacked London because of their desire to harm the West – which they view as the ungodly avatar of Jewish and Christian values – at precisely the time when the West's leaders were meeting.

The roots of the terrorism that we saw last week in London coil twisted and sinister in the fertile soil of sheer Dark Age hatred. The people who are called upon to till that soil, namely Muslims in the Middle East and around the world, must emphatically reject that call.

Whether they do is the real "critical issue" in the Middle East.

Jewish refugees from Arab lands

I was very pleased to read the front page article "Canadian Jews to join campaign for refugees from Arab lands," (CJN, June 16), as well as your editorial concerning Jews from Arab lands ("Justice for Jewish refugees too") in the same paper.

The issue of Jewish refugees from Arab lands has been kept off the agenda for many years. It is becoming clear to all that it should have been discussed at any and all forums in the world, including Israel. However, in Israel authorities have avoided the issue, for reasons that likely had to do with Palestinians' demands for refugees' compensation. Clearly, their demands will not fade away, but in the interim ours have languished.

I POSTULATE THAT THEY ARE A LOST JEWISH TRIBE...WHEN I ASKED IF THEY PERFORMED SACRIFICES THEY SAID "ONLY FOR OUR CHILDREN'S EDUCATION"

Regrettably, your writer did not contact our organization, Association des Juifs Originaires d'Égypte (AJOE), for our point of view. We have on record testimonies of Jews from Egypt who were mistreated, incarcerated and tortured and whose assets were taken before they were expelled. We are willing to provide information to any organization that can help us move this issue to the forefront.

As you know, in the past, articles like yours have been printed, but without follow-up, progress is not made. As Prime Minister Paul Martin recently said in reference to Jewish refugees, "A refugee is a refugee." Recent or not, refugee issues that are unresolved continue to fester. Your article gives us hope that our case will be taken seriously.

Bar association should deal with Bertrand

It is gratifying that the Supreme Court has reinstated a deportation order made almost a decade ago against Leon Mugesera, a former Rwandan politician, for inciting hatred, murder and genocide and committing a crime against humanity by persecuting Tutsis in Rwanda in 1992.

The court chastised Mugesera's lawyer Guy Bertrand for alleging partiality of the entire Supreme Court and saying it had been tainted by an alleged Jewish conspiracy. While the court described the allegations as scandalous and abusive ("Bertrand blasted for Jewish conspiracy charge," CJN, July 7), it is now incumbent on the Quebec Bar Association to take action against Bertrand for conduct unbecoming.

Just because Jewish organizations, who unfortunately know more about crimes against humanity than other ethnic groups, supported the government's application, it should in no way be categorized as a Jewish conspiracy. By stooping to such depths, Bertrand brought shame on himself and brings the entire profession into disrepute.

Response to Grady-Share

What unmitigated, contemptuous chutzpah! That's the only way to describe Joshua Grady-Share's letter to the editor ("The Canadian Jewish community is lost," CJN, July 7).

Grady-Share can believe what he likes about the pullout from Gaza, but when he calls the democratically elected government of Israel "illegitimate" and describes the Canadian Jewish community as "lost," he crosses the line of legitimate discourse.

It's sad to see how even Zionism – the national liberation movement of the Jewish people – can be corrupted into simplistic and inflexible dogma by simplistic and inflexible people.

Mayne pioneered Jewish studies at U of O

Your very welcome story on the launching of the Vared Jewish Studies Program at the University of Ottawa ("Jewish Canadian studies program launched at U of O," CJN, June 23) left out a very important detail: the fact that Prof. Seymour Mayne of the University of Ottawa, renowned poet and leading authority on Canadian Jewish literature, was the actual pioneer of this wonderful initiative. His efforts over a number of years in the Ottawa Jewish community and at the university were what brought everyone together to make the program a reality.

Mayne is nationally recognized for teaching and mentoring generations of Jewish studies scholars, teachers and professors. Moreover, he will be teaching the Jewish literature component of the program. Without his involvement, the Vared Jewish Studies Program would not have the academic credibility and reputation that it will automatically achieve. To leave him out of the story was an unfortunate oversight.

Israel's very hot summer

By DONALD CARR

It's already a hot summer in Israel. I don't mean the weather (although 31 to 32 degrees in Jerusalem is not exactly cool). Rather, the planned withdrawal from the Gaza Strip is the cause of the heat.

The unilateral decision by the government of Israel to remove the Jewish residents from the midst of that teeming hotbed of Palestinian rejectionism has created a palpable rift across the entire Israeli society.

The country is festooned with orange flags or ribbons denoting opposition to the withdrawal, or blue flags and streamers proclaiming support for the government's decision.

These overt demonstrations of rejection or acceptance are not the only manifestations. If they were, it would be healthy – a people expressing themselves openly in a democratic society.

But, unfortunately, it does not stop there.

A taxi company was told by one of its largest commercial customers that it would no longer receive that customer's patronage, because it was reported – not confirmed, just reported – that its drivers were exhibiting blue ribbons.

Far "right" demonstrators occupied an empty building in the Strip. They had to be expelled by army personnel.

Kach, the remnant of the late Rabbi Meir Kahane's legacy, is alleged to have been involved in the stoning of a young Palestinian Arab close by. The leaders of the residents and of the opponents to the withdrawal have disavowed Kach and now refuse to deal with its members.

The July 6 Jerusalem Post headlines proclaimed that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is leaving Benjamin Netanyahu to "sweat." Netanyahu voted in cabinet to delay the withdrawal and threatens to do so in the Knesset when there is a vote.The suggestion is that he will be fired as finance minister if he does this. So much for cabinet solidarity, which is non-existent in Israel.

It is wonderful to see the return this year of so many visitors from abroad. The hotels are full and so are the restaurants and the unique historical sites that only this country possesses.

And yet, this is a time when a terrible dilemma faces Israel. The Oslo accords and the U.S. "road-map" peace plan set forth the mutual steps to be taken by Israel and the Palestinian Authority. The goal? Some form of mutual "recognition," the formation of a Palestinian state and the establishment of recognized, secure borders for Israel. It was to be "land for peace." But as things have developed, little, if anything, has been done by the Palestinian Authority. Its president, Mahmoud Abbas, has failed miserably to curtail in any meaningful way the Hezbollah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad terror organizations and all of those "freelance" groups that carry arms.

In addition to the reported rocket attacks, daily "incidents" occur – unreported outside of Israel. Hundreds of intended incursions by homicide bombers – not a day passes without one or two – are quietly thwarted by the Israel Defence Forces, but the world never hears of them.

"Land for peace" is a beautiful slogan that carries with it great hopes (whether or not realistic). "Land before peace," the slogan adopted by the opponents of withdrawal often seems to be more realistic.

It may well be that Israel has no viable alternative but to follow through with its plans to withdraw from the Gaza Strip. The condemnation of the rest of the world, including that of the United States, Israel's sole dependable ally, would be too much for this beleaguered country to absorb. However, there are countless indications that the fond hopes for the results of that withdrawal will not come to fruition and that it will truly be a unilateral act, with no reciprocity whatsoever.

The time is long past for any possibility of a referendum of the Israeli electorate on the question of a unilateral withdrawal. Perhaps one colossal mistake Sharon made was his failure to conduct a referendum at a time when it was not merely desirable, but also possible. If the current polls are correct, it might well have resulted in a vote in favour of unilateral withdrawal, but, at the very least, the opponents would have known that the Israeli public had spoken clearly. They could not have condemned the government or the prime minister, nor accused them of usurping democracy, as is now alleged by many.

Sharon addressed the assembly of the Jewish Agency on the morning of June 26. He spoke for about 20 minutes, spending a good part of his time exhorting people to make aliyah from North America.

The message was slightly "off-key" to an audience consisting primarily of wealthy fundraisers, the majority of whom are from the United States, although there were many from other countries, including Canada. Although several planeloads of new immigrants from North America (and other countries) will be landing here next week, few, if any, of Sharon's audience are likely to join them.

He also thanked the audience for being in Israel at this time. (Most Israeli speakers do the same, much to my chagrin.) There is no need to thank anyone for coming to Israel at any time. Rather, those of us who come here should be offering thanks to the Israelis, for what they do constantly to preserve the centrality of Jewish life in this world.

Disappointingly, the prime minister said little about the impending withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, the dismantling of the area known as Gush Katif.

And, more disappointingly, he said nothing about the pain and utter misery of the approximately 9,000 people in 22 communities there, who will be obliged to abandon the homes and businesses they have built lovingly over the past 20 or 30 years. They had been encouraged in that venture by successive Israeli governments – Labour, Likud and coalitions alike – all the way back to 1972, when Golda Meir's administration approved the establishment of the first community there.

This uprooting, no matter how essential, is terribly traumatic for many. It is not just the abandonment of homes, schools, beautifully landscaped parks, shops, hothouses that have produced the most amazing crops, and the crops, themselves – everything that makes for an established community. What is to happen to the cemeteries, which are the resting places of so many who defended Israel, so many killed by terrorists and so many mothers, fathers and children of those obliged to leave?

The future for these people is also filled with doubt. Where will they live? What schools will their children be able to attend? What will be their livelihoods? Who will be their new friends? Government compensation, while welcome, will not redress all of these kinds of human loss.

What a wonderful opportunity the prime minister had to reiterate to the world what Israel is relinquishing in order to meet hopes that come with no guarantees! What a lost opportunity!

The Palestinian Arabs take every opportunity to belabour the world media with every bit of damage or destruction, every injury and every death. Israel still fails miserably to make its case to the world, to demonstrate the incessant breaches of commitments made by the Palestinian Authority, resulting in damage, injuries and death, not to mention its total abandonment of any reciprocity.

Nothing is said about a Ministry of Education handbook, issued on June 8 to the 45 communities in Israel close to the Gaza Strip, advising how to prepare for the expected attacks that will follow the withdrawal from Gush Katif – not "possible" attacks, but "expected" attacks.

Special IDF units, supported by border and civilian police personnel, forcibly removed some 150 anti-disengagement activists from the Moaz Yam Hotel in Neveh Dekalim in the Gaza Strip last week. [Isranet photo]

And little is said about the residents of Gush Katif caught in the political machinations of a world that hopes desperately for a peaceful Middle East, yet knows little and perhaps cares less about the fact that the outlook – the "worldview" – of the enemies of Israel and the Jewish People has no room for "peace" as we know that term and no room for an alien body existing on lands regarded by those enemies as Muslim.

We leave to return to Toronto in a few days. As always, it will be with sadness. But, this time, the sadness is magnified because we know that in a few weeks this society, one way or the other, will embark upon one of its severest tests. One prays that the result will be positive.

It is often said that it is a miracle that the Jewish People, like no other, exists, despite British historian Arnold Toynbee's reference to us as fossils. It is against all logical odds – a miracle – that the State of Israel exists and flourishes. There will continue to be miracles!

Diaspora synagogues at risk

A malicious joke has it that synagogues in outer space are Reform: no atmosphere. Reform congregations have tried to alter that image for the last 50 years. Hence their frequent experiments with liturgy and worship space in an effort to be more "user friendly."

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Though progress can be reported, success has been elusive, for the problem is endemic to most congregations, irrespective of denomination. Larger synagogues try to alleviate it by offering variety and, at the same time, meeting the demand for smaller units: junior congregations, learners' minyanim, child friendly services, "traditional" davening, etc.

Yet, it does not seem to be enough. For most members of large congregations are not regular worshippers. They come mainly to bar or bat mitzvahs and services for other life-cycle events. They often leave dissatisfied, vainly yearning for warmth and a personalized ambience that would make their celebration or commemoration memorable. As others present may have different needs, also expecting special attention, there just may not be enough rabbinic bonhomie and "warmth" to go around. Hence the frustration.

And hence the demand for private bar and bat mitzvah services. These would be more intimate and relieve participants of feeling lost in the crowd. If that's not provided, people complain and, at times, after the event, let their shul membership lapse. Most unaffiliated Jews belonged to a synagogue when they and their children were of bar or bat mitzvah age.

Some say they would not have left had the congregation been small. But small congregations cannot afford the benefit of clergy and must rely on members' abilities to lead services and read Torah. The overwhelming majority of Jews, however, lack such skills. They need to be "besung" and "beprayed" by professionals, even when they would happily give up on being "bepreached." That is why many of the still-existing "do it yourself" services are hives of comparative ignorance.

The traditional shtiebl may be the ideal, but nowadays it only rarely maintains itself satisfactorily. Breakaway congregations and chavurot seldom succeed. They either fold or they grow to resemble the places the founders wanted to get away from.

Another oft-cited reason for quitting shul is the cost. But that may be only an excuse, for most congregations offer dues relief to members in need. Those who are refused may have demonstrated that affiliation is not important enough to them. Indifference is a popular cover-up for ignorance and disaffection.

The challenge of the modern synagogue is to stay financially viable and religiously vibrant while trying to be intimate and attentive to individual needs. Perhaps it's not doing enough, but the task may be beyond the possible.

Which is another reason why we should worry about Jewish life in the Diaspora. If the synagogue fails, can anything take its place?

A volunteer experience like no other

Over the past year, I have had the incredible fortune in this column of being able to reflect on three Israel trips.

Last fall, I wrote about the diversity of my experiences on the Hasbara Fellowships trip, and last month about the lessons I learned on the March of the Living. Since then, I returned to Israel as a student madrichah (leader) and senior hasbara fellow on this year's Israel activism training program for Canadian university students.

Jessica Apter in Vancouver

My friends and I always return from these trips with stories about the people we've met and re-connected with, how many hot soldiers we saw – but who's counting – and our realizations about how much older we are than most of them, and where we prayed, learned or partied – or all three. While those experiences represent many of the most intensely happy times of my life, they tend to blur together.

I am grateful to an organization called Or Meir – and my friend Margaux who encouraged me to volunteer there – for some of the most memorable hours that I spent in Israel during the past month.

Not knowing what to expect, I showed up on a Thursday morning at the apartment where Leora Tedgi, the founder of Or Meir, lives with her husband Nissim and 10 children. They welcomed me into their home, located in a religious Jerusalem neighbourhood, and offered me snacks and drinks, all of which, they jokingly assured me, were kosher.

Leora's eldest daughter, Sarit, an instant friend, chatted about the degrees we are working toward, mine in criminology and hers in early childhood education, and then she brought out her laptop to show me a DVD presentation about the organization that her mother started after she miscarried one of her twins as a result of witnessing a terror attack outside her synagogue. Or Meir now provides food to hundreds of families of terror victims around the country.

Upon hearing the sound of a truck backing up into the driveway next to the family's apartment, Leora and Sarit motioned for me to follow them outside. As I stepped onto their porch, I was amazed at what seemed like an endless supply of challah being unloaded into the alleyway. The day's work began as we packaged the fresh challot in twos, to be blessed the next night at Shabbat dinners across the country.

Soon after the first truck was emptied, another showed up, this one even bigger and full of zucchini and eggplant, all riper and more deeply coloured than any produce I've ever seen in a Canadian grocery store. Next came tomatoes, onions, apples, oranges, cartons of juice and more, as well as the plastic bags and baskets that would be used to deliver them to the many recipients of Or Meir's service.

Then the other volunteers started arriving. They spoke French and English and Hebrew, came in all ages, were black and white, male and female, religious and secular, Sephardi and Ashkenazi, right-wing, left-wing and everything in between. There were university students and yeshiva students, some of whom, like myself, were there as a one-time deal along with others who return every Thursday to prepare food parcels for the terror victims. Best of all, this was an island in a sea of blue and orange t-shirts, the symbols of fierce national debate about Israel's pending disengagement from the Gaza Strip.

They came by bus and car and foot and taxi, smiling determinedly as they approached the rainbow of food stacked taller than their own heads. If my description seems melodramatic, it's because you just haven't seen anything like it.

This volunteer experience was unlike any I'd had before. In the alleyway beside the Tedgi apartment, Leora becomes a mother to more than her 10 children. As the lines that usually classify Jews in the divided society of Israel melt away on that driveway, the volunteers at Or Meir become members of one dedicated and generous family.

When I grudgingly left for Tel Aviv in the late afternoon, it was not before I received rounds of hugs and kisses from Leora and Sarit, and not before I promised them that I would return for many more Thursdays in Jerusalem.

Holding on to that wanderlust

My travels have come to an end. The days of waking up in one city and going to bed in another are no more. It was an amazing six weeks, but, as always, all good things must come to an end.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

Travelling on my own was the experience of a lifetime. There are so many stories to tell, and as the jet lag begins to subside, memories of my trip remain at the forefront of my mind.

Travelling on my own, I had the opportunity to meet many people and engage in tons of interesting conversations. No matter where I was in Europe, though, one thing that always brought a smile to my face was the sound of Hebrew. Yes, there is something slightly odd about walking through halls of Christian art in Florence's Uffizi Gallery against the backdrop of discussions in Hebrew, but when you're in a country where you don't speak the language, it's always nice to get a little bit of comfort from home, and for me, that's what the sound of Hebrew evokes.

I happened to be in Florence for Shabbat and decided to attend services at the magnificent synagogue there. At shul, I met a group of Israelis studying Italian in Florence, as well as a bunch of fellow student travellers who, like me, found themselves in Florence on Shabbat and wanted a Jewish experience.

After touring the old Jewish ghetto in Venice and the numerous magnificent synagogues there, it was amazing to see the Great Synagogue in Florence. In Venice, municipal law prevented the construction of new buildings in the ghetto, meaning synagogues had to be built on top of or into existing buildings. But the synagogue in Florence, the first free-standing synagogue in Italy, is a tremendous sight, from the outside as well as the inside.

Its huge domes reach to the sky and stand prominently in the city's skyline. And after visiting so many magnificent churches and sites of Christian history, it's always interesting to see a Jewish site and start to understand the history of Europe's distinct Jewish communities.

> 'It's so refreshing to take the time to explore and look around'

But the best part of my Shabbat in Florence was the opportunity to meet fellow Jewish travellers from around the world and get that sense of being home that only comes from meeting people with a shared sense of community.

Travelling by myself, I really had the opportunity to experience the different cultures of every city I visited. It's very easy to seek out the familiar, but being on my own, I was really motivated to experience the places I visited on their own terms.

We all like to joke about the stereotypical tourist, camera and map in hand, who misses out on so much while trying to get to the famous landmark that everyone has to visit. Some of the best moments of my travels came when I set my map and guidebook aside and wandered into an out-of-the-way neighbourhood or a local restaurant where I got the chance to see and feel "normal" life, rather than simply have the ultimate tourist experience.

But now that I find myself back in Toronto and about to head off to Montreal for five weeks of intensive French study, I resolve to try to maintain a little bit of a traveller's attitude while at home. It's so refreshing to take the time to explore and look around, to focus on the path rather than the final destination.

At home, it's really easy to slip back into the comforts of routine, so over the coming weeks, I hope to rely a little bit on the traveller mentality and see what it leads me to discover here, at home.

German woman preserves Jewish history

Thanks to Cordula Kappner, a gentle, self-effacing woman with a searing conscience, the vanished world of Lower Franconia's Jews, wiped out by the Nazis through edicts, violence and murder, has been documented for the edification of future generations. Since 1985, Kapper, a 64-year-old retired librarian from the town of Hassfurt, has single-handedly staged 35 exhibits on these nearly forgotten Jewish communities.

Sheldon Kirshner in Hassfurt

Virtually no one else in this picturesque part of Bavaria, bisected by the Main River and known for its rolling hills, vineyards and quaint villages with half-timbered buildings, has gone to the trouble of preserving their history. In recognition of her achievements, Kappner received the Obermayer German Jewish Community History Award two years ago.

Her newest exhibition, which is scheduled to open in November, profiles the Jewish presence in Maroldsweisach, a village north of Hassfurt. Fifteen Jews lived there in 1933, the year Adolf Hitler assumed power.

A view of Ebelsbach

Lower Franconia had 9,000 Jewish inhabitants on the eve of the Nazi era, scattered in cities, towns and villages such as Bamberg, Hofheim and Eltmann. In Hassberge, the county where she resides, there were 445 Jews.

To the best of her knowledge, Jews arrived in Lower Franconia – a politically conservative area – in the 12th century, settling in some 28 localities. They were primarily itinerant peddlers and cattle dealers, observed the strictures of Orthodox Judaism, and were generally poor. With their emancipation in the last third of the 19th century, they left burgs such as Friesenhausen, Gleusdorf, Knetzgau and Altenstein and migrated to villages.

During World War I, 165 young Jewish men joined the German army, and 24 were killed in the fighting.

Traditional anti-Semitism was deeply rooted in Lower Franconia's soil. When a four-year-old boy was found dead in the hamlet of Manau in 1929, Jews were accused of murdering him. The blood libel was blown up by local Nazis. As life became increasingly intolerable for Jews in the 1930s, they began emigrating. On Kristallnacht, in November 1938, mobs burned down the synagogue in Burgpreppach. No other shuls in the region suffered that fate because they were too close to Christian houses, although Torah scrolls and prayer books elsewhere were desecrated.

Shortly after Kristallnacht, Kappner said, public schools expelled Jewish students. As a result, one Jewish family, the Eckmanns, arranged for their daughter Leni to live in Brussels. She survived the German occupation in an orphanage, and after the war, an uncle brought her to Canada, where she was married and had two children. Today, Leni Hoffman lives in Calgary.

Deportations started in late 1941 and continued for the next two years. Jews were sent to Riga, Izbica, Thereriensadt and Auschwitz. Kappner said that only two Jews, a man and a woman, managed to avoid the deportations.

These events, which rendered Hassberge county all but Judenrein, prompted Kappner to organize her first exhibit in Hassfurt, population 14,000 counting surrounding villages. The last Jews of Hassfurt were deported on June 8, 1942. These days, there are no Jews in Hassfurt, but Kappner has heard that a few Jews, who prefer not to identify themselves as Jewish, have returned to the town. The synagogue, built in 1888, was left standing, and is now a suite of medical offices.

Kappner's inaugural exhibit dealt with the deportation of Jews from Lower Franconia, as have many of her subsequent exhibits. On principle, she has never asked for financial assistance, though she did accept a room in a school to mount the first one. "I wanted to be independent," explained Kappner, who retired two years ago.

Cordula Kappner

The first exhibit broke a taboo. "People tended to sweep such matters under the rug," she said. Nevertheless, it struck a chord. "People around here are sincerely sorry for what happened," she said, referring to the Hitler era and the Holocaust.

But a minority of diehards vehemently oppose her activities and remain unrepentantly anti-Semitic. In 2003, a vandal scrawled a Star of David on her house. Out of ignorance, cynicism or malice, the police cast the incident in a positive light, claiming it was meant to commemorate the Holocaust. As well, Kappner was the recipient of an abusive postcard. During the 1970s, vandals desecrated Jewish cemeteries in Memmelsdorf and Untermerzbach, and in 1988, they sprayed a Jewish cemetery in Burgpreppach with swastikas. In all, there are eight Jewish cemeteries in Lower Franconia.

In mounting her exhibits, Kappner has amassed a mountain of material that she stores in an archive in Ebelsbach, a scenic village in the folds of a dense forest southeast of Hassfurt where Jews once lived. Packed to the ceiling with documents, books and folders, the archive is housed in a small room on the second floor of Ebelsbach's municipal building. During my visit, the mayor personally offered his greetings and complimented Kappner on her dedication.

Her interest in German Jews was kindled by a Jewish teacher, a Holocaust survivor. He introduced her to The Diary of Anne Frank, which had an enormous impact on her. "I couldn't forget it. I identified with the Jews."

Born in Dresden, in what would later become Marxist East Germany, she was raised in a Christian milieu. "We were apolitical. We were not Communists," said Kappner, a supporter of the left-of-centre Social Democratic party.

Her father, a soldier in the Wehrmacht, was based in France during the war, and did not fire a shot. But his brother was a Nazi.

Anti-Semitism was banned in East Germany. Yet anti-Semitic attitudes persisted, never really disappearing, she said.

Kappner, who is single, studied library science in Hamburg, in a building that housed a Talmud Torah school before the war. She arrived in Hassfurt in 1979, having been hired as director of the library.

Hassfurt, where prominent Nazi Fritz Saukel was born in 1894, invited former Jewish residents to a ceremony marking its 750th anniversary in 1988.

About 10 invitees showed up, and some came from as far away as Israel, which Kappner has visited 20 times in the last 35 years. She has also paid visits to Majdanek and Sobibor, the death camps in Poland.

In 1988, Hassfurt honoured the victims of Nazism by erecting a stylized sculpture in a wooded park. The grey monument, which is partially obscured by a tree and a bush, contains a biblical verse, rendered in German and Hebrew, from Deuteronomy 30:19: "I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: Therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live."

Kappner likes the sculpture, but believes it should be augmented with a plaque that explicitly mentions the Holocaust.

Like many Germans, she cannot understand how the Holocaust could have happened in a nation as civilized and advanced as Germany. "Civil courage is not a strong German trait," she claimed, a hint of sadness and regret in her voice.

Not all that surprisingly, she is ambivalent about being German. Her ambivalence is such that she drives an Italian-made Fiat rather than a German car. "I always see the gas chambers," she said. "In my next life, I'll be French," she quipped.

Jewish Life

The blue and the grey

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

It's hard to believe, but there were Jews in Toronto, and probably Montreal as well, who were drawing monthly pensions from the U.S. government as late as 1925 for their participation as soldiers in the American Civil War.

An index of Civil War pension recipients indicates that some 4,966 veterans of America's bloodiest conflict filed pension applications from Canada. Although there is no way to determine their religion, one may guess that hundreds of Jewish Canadians served as soldiers – and not all wore Union blue. Some would have sided with Britain and worn the grey uniforms of the Confederate South.

A search for common Jewish surnames like Cohen and Levine produces dozens of results from the Ancestry.com database. Abraham C. Cohen of Toronto, for example, filed for his pension on November 27, 1925, some 60 years after the end of the conflict. Cohen might have been only 15 years old or younger when he served.

Moses Bilsky (1829-1923), one of Canada's most notable Jewish Civil War veterans, is absent from the pension list. A founder of Ottawa's Jewish community, he was lured to California by the Gold Rush and eventually joined Abraham Lincoln's Guard at the beginning of the strife. Although never given the opportunity of serving in the east, he helped subdue a riot in San Francisco after Lincoln's assassination. He was back in Ottawa by 1869.

At least 30,000 Canadians fought in the U.S. Civil War, according to Toronto author Claire Hoy, whose book Canadians in the Civil War was published by McArthur & Co. in 2004.

Many were attracted by "generous signing bonuses of $200 or considerably more offered by Northern authorities to replenish their depleted ranks," Hoy writes. "Others were youthful adventurers caught up in what they saw as the romance and excitement of it all." Still others were kidnapped and sold to compliant U.S. Army recruiters, much as Joseph was sold into slavery in Egypt.

Several Jews from the Canadian territories may have been part of the Union's 23rd Regiment from Cincinnati, which was stationed near Fayette, W. Va. in 1861. As Passover approached, 20 Jewish soldiers received permission from their commanding officer to observe the holiday. To their delight, a requested shipment of seven barrels of matzot, plus several Haggadahs, arrived in camp on the morning of Erev Pesach.

According to an 1866 account by Union soldier J. A. Joel, the group built a log hut for services and foraged the countryside for the other requisites of the seder. "We obtained two kegs of cider, a lamb, several chickens and some eggs," Joel wrote. "Horseradish or parsley we could not obtain, but in lieu we found a weed whose bitterness, I apprehend, exceeded anything our forefathers 'enjoyed.'"

The service began at nightfall and went smoothly until the bitter herb was to be ingested. "We all had a large portion of the herb ready to eat at the moment I said the blessing; each ate his portion, when horrors! what a scene ensued in our little congregation, it is impossible for my pen to describe. The herb was very bitter and very fiery like cayenne pepper, and excited our thirst to such a degree that we forgot the law authorizing us to drink only four cups, and the consequence was we drank up all the cider."

Oh, those glorious High Park picnics

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the Sephardi community in Canada. This column is part of a series chronicling the beginnings of the community in Toronto.

Through A Sephardi Window

The working week was long and hard. In the evening, people would arrive at home after their TTC rides and find that there was little time to do anything other than unwind, eat dinner, prepare for the next day and go to sleep. Such was the routine, week after week.

The weekends were looked upon, as I suppose they still are, with much anticipation. Saturday was Shabbat, with half the day spent in synagogue – praying yes, but also nurturing and maintaining social contacts, and celebrating life cycle events.

Then came Sunday. Ah, Sunday. This was the day to picnic. For us immigrants, Sundays, especially summer Sundays, represented an opportunity. During the week, especially in the winter, we were holed up in our apartments, as none of us owned houses (and certainly no one ever dreamed of owning a cottage). There were no backyards. We existed in an environment that was small and enclosed – travelling from office or factory to home, and back again.

But there is a human desire for open spaces – to stand under the sky with your feet planted directly on the ground, to feel the warm rays of the sun and a breeze on your face. These are needs that a concrete balcony could not satisfy.

Large extended families would participate in these Sunday outings. If you had no family in Canada, friends were adopted and became your family.

Boisterous groups would lay claim to choice picnic areas in places such as High Park or Jackson's Point. The first person to arrive would immediately commandeer as many picnic tables as possible. Then they would wait along the road to the park and direct others to the location of the campsite. The women would sit and play cards in the shade. Elsewhere, the men would gather and debate anything from sports to politics. We kids would play ball, romp and go swimming – but never, ever after eating.

Downwind was the site of the barbecuing. At lunch, all sorts of delicious meats – and even fresh sardines – were placed on the coals. Salads of all kinds were prepared and laid out. Cold beers were covertly consumed (this was Canada, after all).

Sunsets in lakeside cottages were for Canadians. We immigrants had to make due with public parks, and we relished this benefit of citizenship by every Sunday establishing a new campsite for ourselves, if only for one day. Poor Canadians, we thought. They have to go back to their same old cottage week after week. We, on the other hand, had our High Park and Grenadier Pond, as well as Jackson's Point, the Toronto Islands, and Wilket Creek Park (Earl Bales Park did not yet exist).

It was a marvellous time. What a shame it came to an end.

Parents began to buy houses and lamely traded these glorious picnic spots for their own backyards. We kids grew up and were no longer interested in going on these weekly excursions. We, too, became Canadian. Some of us even bought into the cottage lifestyle and bequeathed those coveted campsites to the next wave of immigrants to enjoy as a refuge from their own hot and cramped apartments.

Clinton's failings and his successes

The Survivor: Bill Clinton in the White House* by John. F. Harris, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

As U.S. president, Bill Clinton was nothing if not resilient; it was perhaps his most enduring and outstanding attribute.

Former speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives Newt Gingrich, Clinton's abrasive political opponent, once offered this barbed prediction: "Mr. President, we are going to run you out of town." He should have known better. In a previous encounter, Clinton had assured him: "Do you know who I am? I'm the big rubber clown doll you had as a kid and every time you hit it, I bounce back. That's me – the harder you hit me, the faster I come back up."

John Harris was the Washington Post's White House correspondent from 1995 to 2000. In a clear, balanced, informed and scrupulously honest account, he describes all the significant events of the Clinton years, as well as the former president's conspicuous personal failings and hard-won successes.

Despite his widely denounced sexual misadventures and the dramatic impeachment process, Americans voted for him because of his undeniable charisma, unquenchable optimism and political astuteness. Opinion polls found that if he had been permitted to run for a third term, even after all the scandals and skulduggery, he'd have won with ease.

Harris is sure that however reckless and irresponsible Clinton could sometimes be in his personal relations, he nonetheless brought "a dutiful sensibility to his public life."

Although Clinton was often indecisive when vital decisions had to be made and although he examined and re-examined policy choices endlessly, he usually made the proper decisions in the end, Harris writes.

"On Bosnia in the early years and then on Kosovo in 1999, the president did shrink from military action while hostilities continued and innocent people died. But the war in Bosnia was settled at an administration-sponsored peace conference in Ohio in 1995, and a few weeks of American bombing persuaded [former Serbian leader] Slobadan Milosevic to give up his assault on Kosovo in 1999. By the time Clinton left office, Bosnia was in the midst of a peaceful recovery, and Milosevic had been deposed from power and was awaiting trial as a war criminal."

However, Clinton ordered the bombing of a pharmaceutical factory in Sudan – a decision he made, it has been suggested, to distract attention from [Monica] Lewinsky's testimony at the Starr inquiry. The inquiry was due to begin the day of the cruise missile attack – Aug. 20, 1998.

In the aftermath of the Lewinsky scandal, Clinton met with a group of clergymen at a prayer breakfast. He opined that perhaps something good could emerge for America's families from the sordid scandal and that by his example "the children of this country can learn in a profound way that integrity is important and selfishness is wrong." Clinton continued, "God can change us and make us strong at the broken places." How sincere his contrition was remains in doubt.

Harris devotes considerable space to Clinton's relationship with Israel. Toward former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, his feelings bordered on adulation. Some of his advisers observed that Clinton seemed to regard the gruff Israeli as something of a father figure.

At the Camp David peace summit in July 2000, former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak offered more concessions to former Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat then ever before. Clinton pleaded with Arafat: "This is the best deal you're gonna get. For God's sake, don't turn this down. It'll never get better." But Arafat was unable or unwilling to accept the blessing of peace. The result was the senseless and bloody intafadah.

This unfailingly absorbing account serves as a necessary corrective to Clinton's own recent autobiography.

Readers' favourites, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Every week, I scour the Internet to tell you about the best Jewish and Israeli websites. But on the Internet, there's always something new and thankfully, people who want me to know about it. This week and next, I once again turn the column over to readers who recommend sites that have caught their eye – or may even have created themselves.

Batya Medad writes from Israel. "I write two blogs, as a proper Jewish Gemini should. The first, Shiloh Musings, contains essay, political commentary. They're based on my life, here in Shiloh. I weave the personal, spiritual and political with a dose of humour here and there." [http://shiloh musings.blogspot.com/] Medad continues, "Me-ander, my second blog, is both a poetic diary and notes and reflections on shiurim, Torah classes, I take on Tehillim, Psalms and Kohelet, Ecclesiastes." [http://me-ander.blogspot.com/]

Medad's range is indeed wide. Regarding the disengagement, she says, "We must keep reminding our fellow Jews of the immorality of their actions." She criticizes Jewish freelancers who give away their material to Jewish community papers and make life difficult for working journalists. And she talks about health issues, including having a good night's sleep and Brooke Shields and postpartum depression.

Larry Grossman, from Benicia, Calif., has written to update me about "the best portal to Jewish webcasting." He said that "The Jewish Webcasting Guide now catalogues about 150 [webcasts/ers worldwide] and has a backlog of about 100." Grossman has done an incredible amount of work listing sites such as Jadio, "Jewish lectures and discussions authored by some of the world's most compelling Jewish scholars," and jewTunes, "Youthful, hip and iconoclastic Jewish music webcasting." [www.jewishwebcasting.com]

Harris Gulko writes from Jerusalem, "I am an ex-Torontonian, formerly the national director of Jewish National Fund of Canada, now retired, living in Israel… I invite you to check out my website, which displays many of my original oil paintings – landscapes, seascapes, religious themes, Israeli sites, abstracts and more." [www.gulkopaintings.com/gallery.html]

And finally, three different kinds of singers. A few weeks ago, I told you about the Eurovision song contest in which Israel would be competing with 38 other countries for musical supremacy. Shiri Maimon surprised the competition by placing a respectable fourth with Hasheket Shenish'ar (The Silence That Remains). Brian Torobin writes, "If you did not get a chance to see the shows, here are two links to Dutch television's streaming feed of both the semifinal and the final." [http://tinyurl.com/bwqdq] You can watch it all or jump straight to Maimon at the 30:30 mark of the semi-final [http://tinyurl.com/bwqdq] and at 48:20 of the final. [http://tinyurl.com/9s4el] Greece took home first prize. You can watch Helena Paparizou's winning entry at 1:22:30.

Charlie Bernhaut writes, "I am a co-founder of Cantors World, an organization dedicated to reviving and promoting traditional chazzonus." What I particularly like about the site is that it not only celebrates such giants of Jewish cantorial music as Yossele Rosenblatt but also promotes new talent, such as Berel Zucker, winner of the Cantors World Talent Search. There's a section where cantors looking for employment and congregations looking for cantors can talk about themselves. [www.cantorsworld.com]

And Dan Hartal wrote with a request. He'd like me to do a column on Jewish rock bands. Sounds interesting... but I'd be derelict if I didn't mention that Hartal takes a particular interest in this topic because he is none other than "Schmelvis." As profiled in The CJN [www.cjnews.com/viewarticle.asp?id=6077], when you take some schtick and add Elvis, you wind up with… Schmelvis. And if you wind up at Schmelvis' site, you can watch him deliver his heartfelt ode Love Me Blender. [www.elvisschmelvis.com/music.html]

Do you have a favourite Jewish or Israeli website? Or have you created one yourself? Tell me about it at the address below and I may mention it in the future.

Don't forget, the Maccabiah Games are now underway in Israel, and Ynetnews.com is providing real-time coverage of the events. [www.ynetnews.com]

Morgan praises relationship with Aborignals community, including a letter-writing campaign and the lobbying of Canadian Jewish Congress... The decision by the advisory council is a clear indication of where the power in this country lies." He said he would not voluntarily relinquish the Order of Canada.

Jewish organizations welcomed the guilty verdict. Congress spokesperson Wendy Lampert said the conviction "is an expression to Canadians that this kind of hatred is unacceptable."

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said that at the press conference, Ahenakew "basically repeated the same anti-Semitic calumnies, a little more carefully."

In a statement released following Ahenakew's press conference, B'nai Brith Canada said, "Ahenakew has proved yet again that his hate crime conviction is fully justified.

"What is particularly outrageous is that Ahenakew hides behind the good name of First Nations peoples by invoking their communal history to justify his wilful promotion of hatred. His allegations of conspiracy theories targeting the Jewish community should be denounced."

Congress president Ed Morgan said, "Ahenakew's actions may have temporarily captured the attention of Canadians, but they do not define the relationship between the Jewish and Aboriginal communities. Our communities have a long history of interconnection and compassion for each other's issues, and that will not change because of an individual."

Morgan and Farber were in Yellowknife last week where Morgan addressed the AFN at the invitation of AFN chief Phil Fontaine. He said he mentioned the Ahenakew case in his address and the issue came up during discussions.

"I'm hopeful, and I think the AFN leaders are hopeful, that eventually there is a silver lining in this cloud. It will prompt us to get to know each other better," he said.

Fontaine has committed to participating in a mission to Israel, where developments in agriculture, water management and the resurrection of the Hebrew language interest Canadian native leaders, Morgan said.

For their part, Morgan and Farber agreed to visit native reserves to better understand conditions there.

Morgan was told by Aboriginal leaders that Ahenakew did not represent Indian groups. However, he did hear from some native sources that they feel more attention is paid to anti-Semitic outbursts than to the racism suffered by native peoples.

Assembly of First Nations Chief Phil Fontaine presents a gift to CJC National President Ed Morgan following his speech at the AFN annual meeting last week.

Sentence upsets Jewish groups

Joel Richler, chair of Congress' Ontario region, said "our frustration lies in the fact this sentence cannot be taken as a serious deterrent for crimes of hate... A crime like this victimizes the survivors of the Holocaust, their families and the Jewish community. As such, it cannot be forgotten."

"These event traumatized the Jewish community as well as the community at large. No sentence will ever take away the hurt this young man and his accomplices caused," added David Engel, chair of the UJA Federation board.

B'nai Brith called the sentence "minimal" and said it "shows the need for review of hate crimes cases."

The sentence "shows just how weak the justice system is when it comes to hate-related activity," B'nai Brith said in a news release.

In the initial stages of Vandermey's case, the crown had charged Vandermey with the more serious offence of mischief against a religious institution, but that charge was withdrawn after his two accomplices – who, as young offenders, cannot be named – were acquitted of the same charge.

The judge in that case ruled the two were motivated not by anti-Semitism, but were merely attempting to do something to get themselves on television.

"Although the judge clearly recognized the impact on the community and the need to denounce such behaviour, in the end the sentence failed to meet the [judge's] intent," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith.

Furthermore, failure to proceed to trial with the charge of causing mischief to religious property "left the community unprotected. The sentence only exacerbated this procedural miscarriage of justice," Diamant added.

"This case demonstrates a clear need for a review of such hate crimes cases and the existing sentencing guidelines that apparently drive them," he said.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation said he wrote a statement to the court indicating he did not believe Vandermey appreciated what he did, "both because he was drunk and he didn't really understand what anti-Semitism was."

After having discussed the incident with him, he believes Vandermey is today "exceptionally contrite."

"As it all kind of hit him, he realized this was not only a vile and illegal act, he began to understand why the Jewish community was so outraged," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl told The CJN.

"He slowly began to come to grips with what anti-Semitism was and, in that process, began to regret what he'd done and [see] that it was connected to a long history of hatred to Jews."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said Vandermey's parents asked him to talk to their son to help straighten out his life. Vandermey's father works for Beth Tzedec.

Vandermey volunteered to do maintenance work at the synagogue, as well as landscaping at the shul's cemetery.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said the sentence is appropriate and does send a message of deterrence to others. House arrest "is a statement of social censure," he said.

"I think it's a balanced decision that tries to take into account the anger and outrage of the community and the reality of this particular person," he added.

Prior to sentencing, Vandermey apologized in court for the hurt he caused.

"At the time, I did not know the extent of the fear I would cause in the Jewish community," Vandermey told Judge Paul Taylor. "This was due to ignorance and lack of knowledge in the way the Jewish people have been treated in the past and the way they are still being treated."

Court heard that on the night of the incident, Vandermey drank 13 bottles of beer at a party and decided to do "something stupid" to celebrate his 18th birthday.

In sentencing Vandermey, Taylor said "The need for denunciation is great.

"An attack on a specific group or religious institution has to be seen as an attack on each and every one of us and every religious institution," he stated.

Montreal's UTT bomber didn't act alone, parole board reveals

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL –The teenager who firebombed a United Talmud Torahs (UTT) school last year was under the influence of a man described by police as a "known activist" who was never apprehended, a National Parole Board document reveals.

The document says the man was not accused "for technical reasons" and Sleiman El-Merhebi, 19, has refused to provide any details about the individual to police.

This information is contained in the board's written rejection of El-Merhebi's request for day parole or early conditional release last month, and it's the first official confirmation that evidence exists that El-Merhebi did not act alone.

Crown prosecutor Anne Aube said at his sentencing that she believed others were involved in the crime, but because there was no trial, the evidence was never made public.

Judge Jean Sirois described the arson as a terrorist act, but said there was no evidence that El-Merhebi was connected to an organization. In handing down a 40-month sentence for a crime that carries a maximum penalty of 14 years, Sirois cited as one reason the psychiatric opinion that he is not dangerous.

El-Merhebi began serving a two-year federal prison term on Jan. 18 after pleading guilty to the April 5, 2004, arson of the library of the St. Laurent UTT. He had been in custody since his arrest the following month. (The eight months he spent in custody before sentencing were counted as 16 months against his sentence.)

The board said police learned the "known activist" was in contact with El-Merhebi and "possibly influenced" him to commit the crime.

"According to the investigator, this individual is a known activist. For your part, you acknowledge having been encouraged by this man, but refuse to divulge" anything about him, the document quotes the board as telling El-Merhebi.

Although he has an otherwise spotless disciplinary record during his incarceration, El-Merhebi has completely refused to co-operate with the investigation of this individual, the board said.

The board turned down El-Merhebi's request for parole because there are "reasonable grounds to believe" that if he were let out he would "commit an infraction accompanied by violence before the expiration of his sentence," because authorities think he could be easily influenced to do so and remains emotional in his reaction to events in the Middle East.

The board also takes seriously the threat of more violence against the Jewish community contained in the note left at the scene of the crime, signed by "Les Brigades du Cheick Ahmed Yasine," referring to the Hamas spiritual leader assassinated by Israel in March 2004.

The board describes Lebanese-born El-Merhebi as immature, impulsive, short-tempered and susceptible to "the influence of people more fanatical" than him.

The parole board agreed that there appeared to be nothing in El-Merhebi's past to suggest he would commit a crime of this gravity and with such a hateful motivation. In Canada since 1992, El-Merhebi is described as having adapted well to the country, coming from a functional family and having no previous record or history of serious violence. He claims little interest in politics or international affairs.

The board also said it is "skeptical" of El-Merhebi's vague explanation of his actions that he had difficulty controlling his emotions, and said it's "perplexed" why he would resort to terrorism.

The board noted that the UTT arson was a premeditated hate crime and the note placed at the scene "left no doubt" that the Jewish community was being held responsible for actions of Israel. The note was clear in its threat to strike again and to do so more violently.

Hitler's art on the block

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The man who will be taking bids on several sketches and postcards by Adolf Hitler at a local auction later this month said he hates the Nazi dictator and all tyrants as much as anyone, but he is merely doing his job.

"My own grandfather was in a concentration camp," auctioneer Iegor de Saint Hippolyte of the Iegor-Hôtel des Encans auction house told The CJN. "But I'm doing it for the same reason I would sell a poster of Lenin or Trotsky. I have exactly the same feeling as they do, but it is part of history and also my job."

Jewish organizations expressed dismay last week about the July 19 and 20 auction of four architectural-type sketches and two greeting cards composed by Hitler during the 1920s and 1930s.

One of the greeting cards is a Christmas card sent by Hitler in 1935 wishing the recipient "most heartfelt good wishes" for the holiday and new year.

More Jews speak Russian than French, study finds

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Russian has surpassed French as the second most spoken language among Canadian Jews, according to an analysis based on the 2001 census.

The report on immigration and language among Canadian Jews, the fifth in an ongoing series by UIA Federations Canada on the community's composition, shows that Russian is the mother tongue of just over seven per cent of Jews in this country, or 26,500 people, and is spoken at home by a little more than 20,000 individuals.

By contrast, French is the mother tongue of 22,125 Jewish Canadians and is spoken at home by nearly 18,000.

English continues to dominate among Jews and Jewish homes in Canada. It's the mother tongue of 260,500 people, or 70 per cent of the community, and it's spoken at home by 310,000, or nearly 84 per cent of the Jewish population.

The surge in Russian speakers is attributed to the 16,295 Jewish immigrants from former Soviet republics who arrived between 1990 and 2001. They comprised half the total number of Jews who came to Canada in this period.

Because they are relatively new arrivals, former Soviets and their children still tend to speak Russian at home, explains Charles Shahar, the study's co-author.

However, the study shows that Jewish speakers of Russian and French are concentrated in specific geographical areas. The largest segment of those with Russian as their mother tongue is in Toronto, with 18,890. The numbers drop to 2,840 in Montreal, 1,230 in Vancouver, 980 in Calgary, 745 in Ottawa, 680 in Edmonton, and 320 in Winnipeg.

Mother tongue is traditionally defined as the first language learned.

Toronto also leads among those who speak Russian at home – 15,160, followed by Montreal (2,320), Vancouver (940), Ottawa (620), Calgary (560) and Edmonton (490).

Montreal has by far the largest number of Jews with French as their mother tongue –16,930 – followed by 3,230 in Toronto, 570 in Ottawa, and 435 in Vancouver. Montreal also leads in the number of French speakers in the home, with 15,425. Next is Toronto with 1,260 and Ottawa with 305.

The report lumps languages traditionally spoken by European Jews – Polish, Hungarian, Romanian and German among them – into one heading called "all other." Nearly 28,000 Canadian Jews fell into this category by mother tongue, and nearly 7,500 by home language.

Yiddish is shown to be still widely spoken in Canada, both as a mother tongue (20,430 people) and in the home (7,100).

Montreal has both the largest number of Yiddish speakers as a native language (9,705) and in the home (5,655). Shahar says this is because Montreal has a large elderly population as well as some 11,000 Chassidim, who typically have larger families.

In Toronto, 7,725 Jews reported Yiddish as their mother tongue and 1,255 speak it at home.

Winnipeg has the third biggest number of native Yiddish speakers, at 1,155, but, reportedly, only 40 individuals still speak it at home.

The 2001 census itself reported a 10 per cent decline in the number of Yiddish speakers in Canada, and a slight drop in those who speak Hebrew as their first language.

The UIA study found slightly more than 13,000 Canadian Jews whose first language is Hebrew and nearly 7,000 who speak it at home.

Toronto has 7,645 native Hebrew speakers and 4,190 individuals who speak it in the home.

In Montreal, the respective numbers are 3,160 and 1,755.

Finally, the report tallied 4,575 Jews in Canada with Spanish as their mother tongue and 2,255 people who speak it at home, most of them in Toronto (2,170) and Montreal (1,345).

Number of S. African Jews grew 50% from 1990 to 2001

In a front-page story in the June 30 issue on the UIA Federations Canada report examining Jewish immigration to Canada, The CJN neglected to mentioned the influx of Jews from South Africa.

According to the UIA Federations analysis, there were 6,110 South African-born Jews in Canada as of 2001.

The community's median age was 41.

Of the total, 2,110 arrived between 1990 and 2001, an increase of more than 50 per cent.

The Toronto area had the highest number of South African Jews, with 4,370. The rest lived in Vancouver (715), Edmonton (185), Montreal (150), Calgary (145), Winnipeg (115), Hamilton (50), Ottawa and London each with 45, Kingston and Victoria each with 30, Regina (10) and 20 in Atlantic Canada.

The study did not provide figures for South Africans' levels of education or income.

New Israeli wine gets own section at the LCBO

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – For the first time, an Israeli wine is being sold at the LCBO on a regular shelf labelled "Israel" rather than in the liquor store's kosher section.

"The LCBO has helped me make history," Barry Saslove said at the launch of his winery's Aviv Cabernet Sauvignon 2003 at an Ottawa LCBO outlet east of Parliament Hill.

"Up until now, all of the wines brought in were kosher, but I don't want it to be put in the kosher section. I represent Israel and for the very first time, Israel appears on the shelf alongside Italy," said Saslove, whose Saslove Winery is not kosher.

"The LCBO should be given credit for this, and they have opened the door for some of the other 220 [Israeli] wineries which do not necessarily produce kosher wine."

Saslove Winery is a family-owned and operated boutique winery located in Kibbutz Eyal in the Upper Galilee. A former computer engineer, Saslove was born, raised and educated in Ottawa.

"I went to Israel during the Six Day War and found purpose in life… I found that my individual existence in Israel had purpose and meaning," Saslove said. In 1971, he married an Israeli woman and they have built a life, a family and a business together in Israel.

A wine lover for many years, Saslove has been producing wine for commercial distribution for more than a decade. He has also written two books in Hebrew about wine and teaches wine-making courses at Israeli universities.

Saslove Winery is relatively small, producing only 55,000 bottles each year, but it has begun exporting its products, which are now available in the United States, Canada, England, France and Russia.

"In 2003, we decided to put our wines on the world market. We went to Bordeaux to the wine expo and came back with a medal. In 2005, we were named winery of the year," Saslove said.

Speaking at the wine launch and tasting, conducted jointly by Saslove Winery and the embassy of Israel, Israeli Ambassador Allan Baker also commended the LCBO for its efforts.

"As ambassador from Israel, I am extremely proud to be here today in the LCBO, in this wonderful ambience, with a prize-winning Israeli boutique wine," he said. "Why is Israeli wine so interestingly good? Israel is a very small country but there are many different regions with very different climates and growing conditions."

Saslove was pleased to have the Canadian launch of his wines in Ottawa and practically around the corner from his late father's business.

"My late father's business was Saslove's Meat Market, which is still in the Byward Market and still going strong. [It's now owned and operated by the Diener family.] He believed in quality and believed he had the best, and I have acquired his values. I believe my wine is the best, too," he said.

"I am here because I am closing a circle in my life… being here in Ottawa at the LCBO means another dream has come true. And the wine is good!"

Work on Vancouver Jewish museum to begin in fall

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The fundraising drive for the new Jewish Museum and Archives of British Columbia has almost reached the half-way mark.

Catherine Youngren, chair of the museum steering committee, says 48 per cent of the museum's goal of $1.9 million was collected by the end of June.

She is confident they will reach 50 per cent of their objective by early fall when construction of the museum is slated to begin.

The museum, a project of the Jewish Historical Society of British Columbia (JHS) in co-operation with the Jewish Genealogical Institute of British Columbia (JGIBC) is set to open in early 2006.

It will occupy space in the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver formerly occupied by The Jewish Family Service Agency.

The museum will contain an archives research room and a resource/reading room, as well as exhibit space.

Proceeds of the fundraising campaign will go towards outfitting the space, producing a permanent exhibit about Jewish life in British Columbia and covering museum operating costs for the first three years.

Youngren, president of the JGIBC, says members of the agency will contribute resource material and will provide volunteers to work at the museum.

"We anticipate regular visits to the museum from our resident Jewish community," Youngren says.

"We also will strive to have programming with cross-cultural appeal for the Vancouver community at large. We see lots of opportunity for school programs for both Jewish and non-Jewish students, and we hope that by effectively marketing our museum we will encourage visits from tourists and from international scholars."

The JGIBC has collections of family histories, and the JHS has collections of artifacts, photographs, recorded memoirs and memorabilia.

Most of the historical society's archival holdings are currently in storage, with limited access to researchers and other interested parties.

The museum is being designed by Vancouver architect Richard Henriquez.

Aldrich/Pears, planners and designers of museums around the world, has been retained as the exhibit designer under the direction of one of the principals, Ron Pears.

Jewish history in British Columbia began in the 1850s, when the first Jews arrived with the hordes of prospectors from California and eastern North America looking for gold.

Since then, Jewish communities have taken root in Greater Vancouver, Victoria and Kelowna. Until a generation ago, Vancouver's Jewish community was small and insignificant. But beginning in the 1980s, stimulated by immigration from all over the world, the Jewish population began to grow quickly.

Today, Greater Vancouver has a Jewish population of approximately 30,000, making it the third largest Jewish community in Canada.

Members of the museum steering committee are Catherine Youngren, Gary Averbach, Shirley Barnett, Bill Gruenthal (JHS president), Richard Henriquez, Cyril Leonoff (JHS historian), Ronnie Tessler, Steven Turnbull and Rabbi Yosef Wosk.

Museum advisory committee members are Sheldon Chandler, Irene Dodek, Michael Geller, Mel Kotler, Dr. Robert Krell, Dr. Richard Menkis, Josephine Nadel, Stephen Shapiro, Rabbi Dr. Lewis D. Sutker and Sarah Tobe.

Bertrand feels he was 'crucified' by high court

MONTREAL – Guy Bertrand has no regrets about having alleged that a vast Jewish conspiracy was behind the Canadian government's efforts to deport his client Leon Mugesera, a Rwandan exile accused of inciting genocide.

Bertrand, a well-known Quebec City lawyer, was severely reprimanded by the Supreme Court of Canada for the allegation, which it denounced as not only groundless, but also anti-Semitic. The denunciation was issued June 28 jointly with the court's upholding of the immigration minister's appeal of the overturning of a deportation order against Mugesera by a lower court.

"I am not going to hide the truth because an ethnic group is powerful. There are people who have manoeuvred to get Mr. Mugesera deported and it appears that they are Jews. This has nothing to do with their ethnicity. It's their behaviour that I condemn," Bertrand said in an interview in French with Canadian Press.

His conspiracy theory cast aspersions on Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Supreme Court justice Rosalie Abella and her husband Irving Abella.

Bertrand said he was deeply wounded by the court's denunciation and is planning a retort.

"I have to do something. I was crucified in public. I feel crushed," he said.

The Quebec bar is looking into whether a complaint should be lodged against Bertrand with its disciplinary committee.

Bertrand also lamented in the interview that the court did not give a fair hearing to his motion for a stay of proceedings last November, in which he alleged Cotler plotted with CJC to get Rosalie Abella appointed to the court in order to influence the case against Mugesera.

"They gave me only 15 minutes to plead this case and they did not ask me a single question. They violated the principle of 'audi alteram partem' [hearing from the accused before condemnation]. Coming from the highest court in the country, that is an appalling error," said Bertrand, who has had a 40-year legal career.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I love blueberries and I know they are supposed to be good for you. What makes them so good and are they equally good in baking as they are fresh?

A. Blueberries are very healthy. They are full of antioxidants and a good source of fibre. They also contain a unique pigment called anthrocyanins, which gives them their dark, rich colour and may be beneficial for brain cell function, although the research in this area is still developing. Blueberries are delicious fresh as well as in baking, but studies suggests that they lose a lot of their nutritional benefit when heated. So enjoy them fresh more often.

Q. A few years ago, I was told to take high doses of antioxidant vitamins, yet now I read that too much vitamin E may be hazardous. How much is the right amount?

A. I always caution patients that just because a little of something is good, it does not mean that more is better. Taking megadoses of any vitamin or supplement may have a detrimental effect on your health, and vitamin E is a perfect example. Most multivitamins contain between 25 and 65 IU (international units), which is well within the safe range; and most Canadians consume between 10 and 20 IU per day in their diet. However, many supplements contain 400 IU or more, and at these levels, trouble seems to occur. They may actually increase the risk of stroke and cancer.

Vitamins A, D, E and K are fat soluble vitamins, which means that if you take in more than your body needs, it will store them, not excrete them, a process that can build up over time.

Q. My elderly mother has been told that her potassium level is low. I would like to know what role potassium plays in the body and what are some good food sources.

A. Potassium is an important nutrient and electrolyte that has many vital roles in the body: building protein, maintaining fluids and blood pressure, helping neurons transmit brain signals and helping muscles contract, including the very important heart muscle. There are many easy ways to get potassium in the diet – baked potatoes with the skin are a great source, as are squash (like winter squash), spinach, papayas, bananas and artichokes.

Cousins meet for the first time

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

These days, although many people don't know all the members of their extended family, most know their first cousins.

However, in years gone by, things were not so simple, with travel and communication being more difficult and taking longer.

In Toronto recently, first cousins Joe Samuels, 66, and Max Zeller, who would only say that he is well into his 80s, met for the first time in their lives.

"It's been fun to meet each other," said Samuels, who has lived in South Africa all his life.

He and his wife Rosanne are in Toronto to visit their son Frank before immigrating to Australia this month to be close to their two other children, Jonathan and Jessica.

Zeller and his wife, Helen, have lived in Canada since 1946, when they moved here from Germany. (Zeller was actually born in Lithuania and lived in Russia during the war before travelling to Germany.)

The cousins met for the first time at Frank's house over Shabbat tea, and they have seen each other a couple of times since.

Samuels' and Zeller's parents came from a family of six children – five boys and a girl – in Lithuania.

Although Samuels' father and Zeller's mother were brother and sister, neither cousin knew that the other existed because their parents never talked about their extended family or where their siblings ended up after leaving Lithuania.

Max Zeller, left, and Joe Samuels

A couple of years ago, Samuels' brother Peretz, who lives in Melbourne, Australia, began to put together a family tree, and this led Zeller's and Samuels' mutual Canadian first cousin, Danny Epstein, to contact Samuels while Epstein was on a visit to South Africa.

Through Epstein, Samuels became aware of his other Canadian cousins, including Zeller.

Zeller has one sister, Sonia, who also lives in Toronto, although Samuels has yet to meet her. Zeller also has two sons and four grandchildren.

Samuels, one of three brothers, has four grandchildren.

"We hope to see each other again," said Samuels, who plans to visit Toronto in two years for his granddaughter's bat mitzvah.

Jewish talk show airs on Kitchener radio station

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

He's photographed and interviewed stars such as actor Martin Sheen, poet Maya Angelou and primatologist Jane Goodall.

He runs a photography studio, has co-authored a book, holds motivational seminars for students, volunteers at seniors homes and plays the guitar.

As if he isn't busy enough, Torontonian Barry Shainbaum is also the host of a new Jewish talk show that runs live every Sunday at 11 a.m. on Kitchener's Christian radio station CJTW, 94.3 Faith FM.

As motivated and ambitious as Shainbaum is, he didn't always have such control over his life.

When he was a teenager, he was diagnosed with bipolar disorder, a mental illness characterized by episodes of mania and depression.

But Shainbaum beat the odds and overcame what is usually thought to be an incurable condition. He now has a message for others suffering from the illness that, along with therapy and medication, a dose of spirituality can help in the healing process.

"If you talk to any doctor, most of them will say you have it for the rest of your life. I went off medication 16 years ago. I'm not ill, I'm cured," he said.

"The transformation came from all the years in psychotherapy and the medication… But when you heal your emotions, you can change your brain chemistry. If you believe that we are also spiritual beings – we're not just a body you put pills and needles into – a balance can be restored."

He said that in his case, his ordeal was a long, painful process during which he considered suicide, but he added that finding strength "from without" is a large part of overcoming any obstacle, mental or physical.

"Part of my message is not to accept that you'll never be healthy. Stay on your medication as long as you should, but at some point there may be a breakthrough where you may be able to get past something."

Out of his suffering and long journey toward mental health, the photographer was inspired by people such as the late Charles Templeton, a journalist, author and evangelist, and Dr. Nathaniel Branden, a psychotherapist and philosopher, to write a book about integrity and inspiration.

"Hope and Heroes is about people who, I think, have made the world a better place. I photographed and interviewed 47 people who are in the book," he said.

Shainbaum said the people featured in the book went through life challenges of their own. From Dr. Phil (McGraw) to Nelson Mandela to Julia Butterfly Hill, who lived on a California Redwood tree for two years to protest clear-cut logging, he hopes their stories will inspire others the way they inspired him.

But Shainbaum's determination to spread the word of hope did not end with the publication of his book in 2003.

While promoting his book at Faith FM recently, the station manager was impressed with Shainbaum and his gift of gab.

"They had me on their show a few weeks ago to talk about my book and the manager called me and said, 'How would you like to have your own show?'"

While the manager truly felt Shainbaum was articulate enough to host a radio talk show, he also had another reason for offering him the gig.

Barry Shainbaum [Sheri Shefa photo]

"To keep the [Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission] happy, you have to have multiculturalism," Shainbaum said.

"They wanted to have a certain amount of Jewish issues – I am Jewish – and they like that [the show is] not going to be all Jewish issues. In addition, it will cover issues of mental health and spirituality beyond religion."

He said at least every other show will address Jewish issues, and the others will cover anything from photography to business to mental health.

"This is a Jewish show. This won't cover issues on Christianity. For the Christian community that listens, it will give them insight to Judaism and Jewish values. For the Jewish community, I will be able to open the door to people I have personally met and put my particular spin on it," he said.

"There will be a connecting thread of messages for people to connect with their problems or with their children and take steps to face challenges. My own message is that the hell I've overcome has given me strength and a belief."

As a staple of the program, Shainbaum promises to end each show with excerpts from the recorded interviews he conducted with the subjects in his book.

"I'll be bringing on Dr. Phil at some point, Maya Angelou, who is Oprah's mentor, Martin Sheen and others. You'll be able to get an insight into the people. Shimon Peres, the former prime minister of Israel – a very insightful, philosophical man – I'll be playing his interview."

His first show, an introduction to what listeners should expect in the coming weeks, aired July 10. Shainbaum has already booked Israeli psychic Uri Geller and actor Ed Asner to appear on the program as guests in the near future.

The show can only be heard on the radio in Kitchener, but those outside the city can listen to it on the web at www.faithfm.org.

Exchange program launched between U of M, Tel Aviv U

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Gerry Schwartz, one of Canada's leading businessmen, may live in Toronto now, but he hasn't forgotten his alma mater.

The University of Manitoba announced last month that Schwartz, who graduated from the university in the early 1960s, has donated $500,000 to establish the Arni C. Thorsteinson International Exchange Program at its I.H. Asper School of Business.

The program will allow undergraduate business students at U of M and Tel Aviv University (TAU) to learn through collaborative exchange programs between the two universities.

Gerry Schwartz

The first such program is scheduled for later this summer.

Rob Warren, director of the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship, said four of his U of M students will be in Tel Aviv from July 30 to Aug. 10, while four students from TAU will be in Winnipeg from Aug. 10 to 20. The students will be studying financial modelling and preparing business plans for a technology venture. On the last day of the program, they will present their business plans to a team of investors.

"This gift shows that Gerry Schwartz has great faith in the ability of the University of Manitoba to deliver world class programs," Warren said.

Schwartz, who also has a degree from Harvard University, began his business career at a corporate law firm in Winnipeg before joining a company on Wall Street involved in mergers and acquisitions. He returned to Winnipeg to go into business with the late Israel Asper. In 1977, they co-founded CanWest Capital, now known as CanWest Global Corp.

In 1983, after parting ways with Asper and CanWest, Schwartz and two employees founded Onex Corporation, the director of which is his friend and colleague Arni C. Thorsteinson, a long-time business leader in Manitoba. In recognition of Thorsteinson's work and friendship, Schwartz established the program in his name.

"This program represents a tremendous opportunity for our students to experience the business culture of another country," Warren said. "Israel is unique in this respect because of its reputation for entrepreneurship and entrepreneurial development. Israel is second only to the United States in the number of high tech start-ups. Our students will get a chance to see a lot more biotech and IT stuff in Israel. And Tel Aviv University is a world-class institution with a strong finance program."

The Thorsteinson program, which is scheduled to run for 10 years, is open to U of M students with high grade point averages who are in their third or fourth year in commerce.

Warren said future exchanges are still in the planning stages.

Israel, Canada pitch in on London bombing probe

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Intelligence officials and detectives from about two dozen countries – including Israeli investigators and Spanish ones who worked on the 2004 Madrid bombing case – met last weekend with British officials to discuss leads in last week's terror attacks in London, British police said Monday.

"We told them what the state of the investigation was" during the private meeting Saturday at Scotland Yard, which included British police and the MI5, Britain's domestic intelligence service, a Metropolitan Police spokesperson said.

"If they can offer any material assistance, we're not going to turn it down. In order to help us, they needed to know as much about our investigation as possible," the spokesperson said on condition of anonymity.

He said the large size of the international meeting at Scotland Yard was unusual, but that it was called to quickly inform as many officials as possible without interrupting the investigation.

Other countries involved were Canada, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Latvia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Romania, Singapore, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States, the spokesperson said.

British police have promised a manhunt and heightened security after more than 50 people were killed and 700 wounded in the morning rush hour blasts that shook London's subway and ripped apart a double-decker bus in the deadliest terror attacks on London since World War II.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said there were signs Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda, the group responsible for the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States that launched the war on terror, was involved in the London bombing.

A day after four bombs tore through three underground trains and a double-decker bus, British police confirmed the death toll had risen to more than 50, with 13 people killed in the bus explosion.

Three Jews are feared to be among the victims.

Susan Levy, 53, from Hertfordshire north of London, was on the Piccadilly line train that was part of bombings near the Russell Square station.

In a statement, her husband Harry said: "Susan was a devoted and much-loved wife and mother of two sons. We are all devastated by our loss. She was a valued and respected member of her extended Jewish family and will be deeply mourned and sadly missed by us and her many friends."

Israeli expatriate Anat Rosenberg, 39, was aboard the bus that was blown up. Her boyfriend, John Falding, told Israeli media that Rosenberg was speaking to him by cellphone when the blast occurred. "I heard shouting, and then the call was cut off," he said.

> 'It has the hallmarks of an Al Qaeda-related attack'

Also among some two dozen people unaccounted for after the attacks is London resident Miriam Hyman, 33. Hyman's father, John, told Yediot Achronot that she called him from outside King's Cross subway station when her train was evacuated after the initial blasts occurred, but she has not been in contact since.

The Israeli Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem said that some 50 Israelis vacationing in London had not been in touch with their families since the attacks, but there was no immediate concern they were among the casualties.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who a day earlier had basked in the glory of London receiving the 2012 Summer Olympics, condemned the attacks and blamed Islamic extremists.

"It has the hallmarks of an Al Qaeda-related attack," Straw said at the G8 summit in Scotland, which was taking place as the bombs went off.

The "Secret Group of Al Qaeda's Jihad in Europe" claimed it was behind the attacks, but the claim could not be immediately verified. In a posting on a website, the group called them punishment for Britain's involvement in the war in Iraq and invasion of Afghanistan. It said Italy and Denmark were on warning for their support of the U.S.-led coalitions in both countries, too.

Home Secretary Charles Clarke, Britain's top law enforcement official, said investigators were concerned that while the London bombers are still at large, they could strike again. "That is of course the No. 1 preoccupation that the police and security services have at this moment," he told BBC radio.

Based on evidence recovered from the rubble, investigators believe some of the bombs were on timers, a U.S. law enforcement official said. Investigators doubted that cellphones – used in the Madrid train attacks – were used to detonate the bombs in the London Underground because the phones often don't work in its tunnels, the official said.

A senior U.S. counterterrorism official who spoke on condition of anonymity said there was no confirmation "at all" that suicide bombers were involved.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon instructed his cabinet not to make any comments equating the London bombings with the situation in Israel.

On learning of the terror attacks Thursday morning, Sharon telephoned Britain's ambassador to Israel, Simon McDonald, and asked him to pass on to Blair his and the Israeli government's shock at the "heinous crime committed against innocent British civilians."

Sharon also asked to convey the Israeli people's condolences to the bereaved families and the British people and said that at these moments, Israel expresses solidarity with them. The world must unite in the war against terror, he said.

Israel was ready and willing to provide any assistance, medical or otherwise, that Britain may require, the prime minister told McDonald.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz contacted his British counterpart, Geoff Hume, to express his condolences and say Israel would continue to be part of the international alliance against terror.

President Moshe Katsav sent a telegram of condolences to Queen Elizabeth II. "Every individual has the basic right to live without fear of terror and violence," Katsav wrote. "This crime further emphasizes the obligation of all the world's nations to join hands and unite in a war to eradicate terror and its perpetrators whoever they may be."

The Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem went into action on learning of the attacks in London, receiving more than 2,500 calls from concerned citizens who asked ministry officials for help in locating family members in London.

"This time, we were well-drilled and efficient," the director of the situation room, Yossi Alfassi, said. "The moment we realized we were dealing with a large incident, more personnel were called in to the situation room and we also opened a situation room at the Israeli Embassy in London."

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom also expressed Israel's sympathy and solidarity with the people of Britain following the attacks. "We are speaking about a very severe blow to London, to Britain," Shalom told Israeli media. "At these moments, all of us are together with them."

For its part, the Israeli Embassy in London said it was unaware of any Israeli casualties, embassy officials told Ha'aretz. Israel placed all its embassies around the world on high alert in the wake of the blasts.

'I still didn't know what had happened' in the street, all on their mobile phones. There seemed to be a lot of police, but no particular reason to be panicking. London had just been awarded the Olympic Games for 2012 and there was certainly a sense of "typical, we can't even get the transport right," because I was convinced that there had been some kind of incident at Euston station and that the commuters had been thrown off the trains.

A woman tapped on my offside window. "I don't think you can go much further," she said. "There's been some sort of an explosion."

I thanked her, but assumed it was a gas explosion and stayed in my traffic lane.

A policeman walked over. "In one minute," he said to me firmly, "I want you to pull as tight in to the curb as you can so that an ambulance can get through."

I obeyed. The traffic moved forward. We were diverted around in a circle, past, though I didn't know it, the bombed bus. The traffic kept going, down Gower Street and past University College Hospital. And suddenly the ambulance and police sirens grew louder and louder, and on either side of me there were vans of police dogs, the dogs barking louder and louder as the sirens wailed. Fire engines struggled down narrow London streets. At Southampton Row, a member of the public stood in the centre of the crossroads and directed the traffic so that the ambulances could get through.

And I still didn't know what had happened. Despite a high level of Jewish alert on terrorism, bombing in London had simply never occurred to me. How naive is that? I finally got to work to be greeted by a flood of anxious colleagues – those who had made it in – and phone calls. I burst into tears. I had been so close to that bus, so close.
